Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the trouble about the request of the gentleman from Texas is, I fear, that it will be considered as a limitation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The request is that there shall be not less than two days' general debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. If that is not considered as a limitation, I shall not object, because I expect that there will be more than three days' debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SETTLEMENT OF LANDS IN OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER. The message laid before the House this morning from the President of the United States will be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COMMUTATION FOR GOOD CONDUCT FOR UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15910) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners," approved June 21, 1902.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners," approved June 21, 1902, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That this act shall apply to all sentences imposed subsequent to July 21, 1902, and to the sentences imposed prior thereto the commutation upon which is less than that provided in this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the act approved June 21, 1902, to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners, and it is to carry out the purpose of that original act, so as to procure a uniform practice in the commutation of all Federal prisoners as far as the Constitution will permit. The act was made to apply solely to sentences subsequent to the passage of the act. It was feared that it could not be made to apply to all sentences imposed prior to the act. This makes it apply to no sentence imposed prior thereto except those the commutation upon which is less than that provided in the act of 1902. This is in order to provide for a uniform practice, and it has been unanimously reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if this bill has been reported by a committee?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS SNAKE RIVER, WASHINGTON.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of bill S. 5181.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 5181) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River between Whitman and Columbia counties, in the State of Washington.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, there are three of these bills. They simply authorize the construction of bridges across navigable waters. They are in the usual form. They have all of the provisions for the safety of navigation, and I ask unanimous consent to dispense with their reading.

The SPEAKER. Are they similar to the bills that were reported at the last legislative day, or the day before that?

Mr. HEPBURN. Precisely; they simply change the name of the river.

Mr. PAYNE. Was the bill read to the House?

The SPEAKER. A similar bill was read to the House, the gentleman states.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will ask the gentleman if three bills are included in the request?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes, sir; Senate bill 5181, Senate bill 5182, and Senate bill 5183.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What is the nature of the bridge to be constructed?

Mr. CUSHMAN. A railroad bridge in each case, to be constructed by the Milwaukee road, on its main line extension to the Pacific. The bills are exactly identical, all three of them, except that the three bills prescribe three separate places of crossings—two crossings being across the Columbia River, State of Washington, and the other being across the Snake River.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This is a private matter, in the interests of private corporations. I shall not object at this time, but I do believe that the people ought to have a chance, and until we can have a vote on Senate amendment No. 40 on the statehood bill, I give notice that——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD (continuing). I shall demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Not to this particular bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to dispensing with the reading of the three bills mentioned, or to considering the same.

The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5181) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River between Whitman and Columbia counties, in the State of Washington.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5182) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Franklin and Benton counties, in the State of Washington.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5183) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Douglas and Kittitas counties, in the State of Washington.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

TERMS OF UNITED STATES COURTS, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for present consideration of the House bill (H. R. 16802) to fix the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama shall be held at the city of Birmingham, in the county of Jefferson, twice in each year, on the first Mondays in March and September, and that said courts shall remain in open session for the transaction of business at least six months in each calendar year.

SEC. 2. That whenever the judge for the northern district of Alabama deems it advisable, on account of disability or absence, or of the accumulation of business therein, or for any other cause, that said court should be held by the justice of some other district or circuit court, he shall, in writing, request the presiding justice for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States to assign a judge to hold the term or terms of said court.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if this bill has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has. The object of the bill is to provide for a longer term of court, so as to dispatch the business.

Mr. PAYNE. I have noticed the large number of bills changing terms of courts and creating new districts and all that sort of thing, brought in by unanimous consent, reported by the Judiciary Committee, and the other day we had a veto message by the President on one of them. I am not willing to allow them to pass without more examination, and I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Only one word, Mr. Speaker. Does the gentleman understand that all this bill does is to extend the length of the term of the court?

Mr. PAYNE. I want to examine the bill to find out what there is about it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to offer an amendment to the paragraph we were on yesterday afternoon when the committee rose. I move to amend on page 110, lines 16 and 17, by striking out the words "five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 110, lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "five hundred;" so as to read: "Chief clerk, $2,000."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment that I have offered is to fix the salary of the chief clerk in the General Land Office at $2,000. We have fixed the salary of scores of chief clerks in the Treasury Department and in the Navy Department and in other Departments of the Government at $2,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman not confounding the chiefs of divisions with the chief clerk? There is only one chief clerk in the Navy Department and one chief clerk in the Treasury Department. The chiefs of divisions receive $2,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; and even the chiefs of bureaus, like the chief clerk of the Comptroller of the Currency. If the gentleman will permit me. I will make the statement that the chief clerk of the General Land Office has under his supervision for the current year 432 employees, more than are in the entire Navy Department or the Department of Justice. His work is altogether of a more laborious and broader character in consequence of this very large division. The chief clerk of the Treasury Department receives $3,000 a year, and the chief clerks of many subdivisions of the Treasury Department receive $2,500 a year. It was in view of the large number engaged in the work of the General Land Office that we increased the salary of the chief clerk, under suggestions of the Department and strong recommendation, to $2,500. Another thing, until within a few years ago this salary had been appropriated for year by year at $2,500.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have read all this evidence. Every head of a Department that comes before the committee is a special pleader. He makes it appear to the committee that the people in his bureau have such vast and onerous responsibilities that the salary ought to be increased. The Director of the Census testified in perfect good faith that the employees in his Department and his chief clerk are the hardest worked people in the Government. The Secretary of War——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I will say that this increase was estimated for, and the Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office came before the committee and did not make special reference in his testimony to the services rendered by the chief clerk; but he appeared subsequently, when the committee was making up the bill, stating the facts upon which the recommendation was made in the estimate.

Now, criticism by the gentleman in respect to the heads of Departments coming before the committee and making representations in regard to the increase of salary—I wish to make this observation: That out of the total increases recommended by the Department in the estimates and asked for by the heads of Departments the committee has not allowed 10 per cent of them. It is only in those cases where from the statement the committee was perfectly convinced that the services and duties of the office were entitled to a greater consideration and greater compensation than they were allowed. And in this particular case it was not only because of the responsibility for the people that he has under him, but also the fact that the chief clerks of bureaus in all the Departments are receiving $2,500 a year while the chief clerks in the Departments receive $3,000 a year.

Mr. LITTAUER. The only statement in the hearings on this subject is on page 429.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I have the hearings. The trouble is that I can not get this committee to hear me. [Laughter.]

As I was stating when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Minnesota, the heads of the Departments come before the committee and constitute themselves special pleaders for the people in their Departments. I want to read a sample of the testimony taken by the committee:

> We feel that this man, after forty years' service, is entitled to an increase. He has not, probably, more than two or three more years to serve. He is entitled to be put on the same footing with other men who are chief clerks and who occupy corresponding positions.

[The time of Mr. JOHNSON having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, if I may be permitted to proceed connectedly I will finish reading the extract.

> He will undoubtedly perform his duties just as well on $1,800 as at $2,000, but he deserves the increase.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will you please permit me a statement right there? You are not reading in reference to this chief clerk who is under consideration now.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, I am not, and if the gentleman will just let me proceed connectedly for one moment, I will show my purpose in reading this. The head of that Department was pleading for an increase in the salary of one of the employees. He put it upon the ground that the man's salary ought to be increased, in order to equalize him with other men who were getting larger salaries and doing like work. It is not in connection with this item, it is simply a sample of the testimony that you find all through the book.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Did we grant the increase in that case?

Mr. JOHNSON. In this particular case that I am quoting the head of that Department candidly stated that the man would perform his work as faithfully at the lower salary as he would at the increased salary. My purpose in reading this is to show to this committee that if we go to fixing the salaries of chief clerks in this bill at $2,500 a year, then at the next session of Congress the heads of the other Departments and the other bureaus will be back here making the sort of argument that I have just read, and they will point to the fact that the chief clerk in the Land Office, and the chief clerk in some other office get $2,500; and as I stated yesterday, the people in those Departments know only one way to equalize salaries, and that is to put the lower man up to the higher one.

Mr. BURLESON. They equalize up and never down.

Mr. JOHNSON. They equalize up. They do not know that you can equalize a $1,200 clerk and a $1,800 clerk by splitting the difference and giving each of them $1,500. The only method that they pursue is to promote the $1,200 man up to $1,800.

As surely as this committee fixes the salary of the chief clerk at $2,500 (I do not know the man and I have no ill feeling against him or any person in any Department of the Government) you will put yourselves in the position at the next session of Congress where you will be asked to increase other salaries in order to equalize them. That is all there is about it.

The compensation of a chief clerk receiving $2,500 a year in the Departments is out of all proportion to the salary paid down here in the Southern Railway offices to the same kind of a man. They do not have any seven-hour day; they do not have any thirty days' leave of absence with pay, and thirty days' sick leave of absence with pay, and half holidays once a week during the summer months. The salaries that you are paying to these clerks are out of all proportion to the pay for the same work in the outside world; and if you continue to jump up the Department employees $250 and $400 and $500 in every appropriation bill, five years from now they will be getting more pay than Members of Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina, in his remarks, in the first place, does an injustice to the heads of the Departments. I do not want the statement that he has made to go abroad as a matter of fact, that heads of Departments come to the Appropriation Committee as special pleaders. No head of a Department, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, ever comes to an Appropriation Committee and asks this unless he is sent for by that committee. In the first place, estimates are sent to the Committee on Appropriations. Those estimates cover all increases asked for. They cover everything. Now, we send for a head of a Department, and for what purpose? To know why that estimate came as it did, and the chairman of the committee has already stated that out of one hundred and more increases asked for we have not granted 10 per cent. I want another statement that the gentleman from South Carolina has made corrected, that chief clerks and other clerks have private secretaries. It only shows that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] is not well acquainted with the administration of these Bureaus and Departments. The chief clerk is this kind of an officer: He is charged with a proper administration of the whole Bureau, or the whole Department, as the case may be. Every clerk of that Department is under him. He is responsible for their work; he is responsible for their time; he is responsible for the method and manner of work that they do. Really, he is the executive officer of that Department. Now, I desire to correct another statement the gentleman has made. This increase here is not an increase above the average of chief clerks in the Departments. It is below the average. Two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, $3,000, and $2,500 is the common run of salaries for chief clerks in the Departments. Here is a man with 432 employees under him. He is responsible for the work, the correctness of the work, the amount of work, and administration of affairs in the General Land Office.

Mr. JOHNSON. What does the Land Commissioner do, if you please?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, now, I am not discussing that.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the gentleman says that this chief clerk is the whole thing. There is somebody above him with a salary of five or six thousand dollars.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. When you come to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if the gentleman wants information, I think he can get it, but I think this House would like to do business straight—one thing at a time—and you will do well, then, to comprehend it. Now, what do I know about the Judiciary Committee and their proceedings? I have no opportunity to know in detail. I must take their statements when they come on this floor as gentleman sworn to do their duty—and give them credit at least for an intelligent and conscientious effort—and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] insinuates that we have not done that. He insinuates that we have been bulldozed by the heads of Departments; that we are influenced by the heads of Departments, and that we—and he uses the word "committee"—are making up salaries and increasing salaries without any regard to a fair and square deal.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman stated that the average salary of the chief clerks in these Departments was $2,750.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; I did not do that. I said this man's salary I thought was below the average. Two thousand dollars is his salary and it is below the average of chief clerks.

Mr. HAY. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the chief clerk in The Military Secretary's office of the War Department, which is one of the largest bureaus in the Government, receives a salary of $2,000; that the salary of the chief clerk of the Judge-Advocate-General is $2,000; in the Signal Office it is $2,000; in the Quartermaster-General's office it is $2,000; and in the Surgeon-General's office it is $2,000. Perhaps, if I had the time, I could go through all these bills——

Mr. LITTAUER. Will not the gentleman go a little bit further and show that the chief clerks to the four Assistant Postmaster-Generals also receive $2,500?

Mr. HAY. I was just showing what appeared in this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, my proposition is this: That the current salary of that man is far below the average, and I can show it from the law. His salary now is $2,000. The salaries of chief clerks run all the way from $3,000 down to $2,000. There are some clerks of class 4 acting as chiefs.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if there has been any intimation that the service rendered for $2,000 has not been satisfactory?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In this case, yes. I will come right down to that if I can get a chance. I am going to make a particular reference to it.

Mr. POU. There has been, the gentleman says, information before the committee that the service rendered heretofore has not been satisfactory, and that is the reason the committee is making the increase?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir; and I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in addition that there are very few increases in this bill, and wherever those increases were made by the committee we had good grounds upon which we can stand. Now, as to the chief clerk of the Bureau of Education, to whom the gentleman from Virginia referred, I want to say that that man's salary ought to have been raised, and I want to go further and say, in my opinion, if it had been brought to the attention of the committee it would have been raised; but not one single thing in the estimates suggested it, not one single person from the Bureau of Education brought it to our attention, and since this bill was made up and put into this House that matter was brought to my attention. Had it been brought to my attention in the committee room I should have insisted that the chief clerk should have gotten $2,000, and he is entitled to it, and if under the rules this bill could be amended I would make the motion to so amend it.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia a question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Did not the Secretary of the Interior ask the Appropriations Committee to put every chief clerk in the Interior Department, no matter what bureau or division he was in, at $2,500?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; he could not have done that. There is but one chief clerk in the Interior Department—only one.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me for just a couple of minutes?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I would like to say especially to those gentlemen who have been attacking the salary of the chief clerk of the Land Office, you cited instances of the chief clerk in the Marine-Hospital Service, I believe, and you cited instances of the chief clerk in The Military Secretary's office, and some other cases where the chief clerk is purely and simply a clerical position. Now, I do not care anything about that——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. A kind of private secretary.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. A sort of private secretary. I care nothing about the personnel of the present chief clerk of the Land Office, but I do know, because nearly all of my business——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for five minutes. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I know that my public business here in Washington is nearly all connected with the General Land Office. I know, gentlemen, that the chief clerk there is in charge of over 400 clerks. He has to be a lawyer to start with, and a pretty good one. In addition to that, he has 103 offices scattered all over this country, with from two to six employees in the different land offices. They have a whole corps of special agents in the field, and the chief clerk of the Land Office is the administrative officer of that department, in actual practice, and while other men draw $2,750 for purely clerical positions, the man who has been doing more work than two or three ordinary chief clerks, a man whom I personally know works an eighteen-hour shift in order to keep up the business of that office, you would hold him down to the old $2,250 salary.

Mr. POU. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. With pleasure.

Mr. POU. It has just been stated by the gentleman from Georgia that the reason that this increase has been given is because satisfactory service has not been heretofore rendered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not understand you to ask that question. I thought you asked me if the salary was satisfactory.

Mr. POU. No; I asked if the service was satisfactory.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If you will excuse me, I will correct that answer now in the RECORD. I supposed you asked me the question if the salary was satisfactory, and I said no.

Mr. POU. No; I asked if the service rendered was satisfactory.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The service is not only satisfactory, but more than satisfactory.

Mr. POU. If the service is entirely satisfactory, where is the necessity for an increase?

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. DIXON of Montana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. To the gentleman on my right.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I want to say further, with reference to what the gentleman from South Carolina said about the Southern Pacific Railroad would not pay a salary equal to this for like services for a chief clerk——

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not say the Southern Pacific——

Mr. DIXON of Montana. The Southern Railroad. I am a little out of the gentleman's immediate territory. I want to say with reference to the duties of the chief clerk of the Land Office, in addition to other duties I enumerated a while ago, that Department handles six to eight million dollars a year from receipts on public land sales. They handle the disposal of eight to ten million acres of public lands every year. A man in private life performing the same duties with the same tremendous responsibilities, the same amount of money passing through his hands, instead of being paid $2,500, would be entitled to $10,000 salary; and while I am certainly just as much in favor of economy in many of these Departments as any gentleman, in this special case I think it is one where there ought to be more salary than that which is now given.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I now yield to the gentleman from South Carolina for a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to call attention to the evidence taken before the committee, on page 410 of the hearings.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to interrupt the gentleman for a moment, right there. In this particular case we did not have the testimony—that is, as I understand, it was not taken down by the stenographer. Therefore the gentleman has got no testimony to talk about. The statement was made by the chief of the Department coming before the committee about the time that we were making up the bill, and therefore the hearings do not contain the evidence on which we made this increase; and therefore you have got nothing to which you can refer as hearings.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is the first time I have ever heard a lawyer argue a case and deny that his record is correct. I understand the record is not made up correctly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We will amend the record.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment is not here.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now I yield, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the gentleman from Georgia or the Committee on Appropriations need any defense with reference to this item. I think this is regarded as the correct thing to do. The committee, in the consideration of this bill, as I understand it, have granted increases where they found the increases were necessary, and not only where increases were requested; that they did not yield to the importunities of bureau chiefs, but when a case was presented of a Government official, confessedly intelligent, faithful, hard-working, and having very large responsibilities upon him, the committee very properly increased his salary to a limited extent only. The chief clerk of the General Land Office, as has well been said by the gentleman from Montana, is the administrative officer of that Office——

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Under the Commissioner.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know nothing about the clerk; never saw him in my life, and there is nothing personal in this matter.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to know, if this chief clerk is the man who is responsible for everything up there and does everything, what the Commissioner of the Land Office and his Assistant do?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman evidently does not understand how important a bureau of the Government the General Land Office is; what an infinite amount of business, detail business, passes through that office; how important the work performed by that Bureau is, and how many things he has got to taken into consideration, and the importance of the volume of work done. The General Land Office force is generally paid less than any other set of clerks or employees in the Government. This clerk is not only worthy of this compensation, but from the duties and large responsibilities that are put upon him he committee would have been fully justified had they increased his salary $500 instead of $250, as they do in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to offer another amendment. In lines 17 and 18, page 110, strike out the words "five hundred."

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 17 and 18 strike out the words "five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina desire to be heard?

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to amend the amendment by striking out of the same line——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia for that purpose?

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to say to the gentleman from Georgia, if he will allow me to proceed for two or three moments, I will withdraw my amendment and let him offer his.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will be recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, before I came to this body I practiced law for many years. I made it a rule never knowingly to misstate a fact to a judge or a jury. A few moments ago the gentleman from Georgia so far lost his usual good temper——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, bless your soul, I was in a perfectly good humor.

Mr. JOHNSON. As to insinuate that I had misstated the facts, I wish now to read a few questions and answers, so that the committee can determine for themselves whether these heads of Departments are special pleaders. As a sample of that special pleading, I will read from page 418:

Mr. LITTAUER. You ask for certain increases of salary. Just let me call your attention to your telephone operator, who is receiving $900, and now you ask for $1,200, and I believe in your notes you state the number of messages received.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many messages are received?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. From 300 to 600 a day.

Mr. LITTAUER. I want to call your attention to the telephone operator who connects your various telephones with the system about the city or in your Department. The telephone operator works at a switch board. Here comes the Secretary of the Navy, who advises us that he needs, also, an increase of force of telephone operators, and asks for an increase of his force from one to two at the rate of $600 a year. Then, in the same building, we come to the Secretary of State, and they want two telephone operators at $900 each. In the Navy Department they ask for two at $600 each, and now you ask that yours shall be increased to $1,200.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But you must take into consideration the difference in the business. Secretary Root, I suppose, has a Department which has not one-fourth the number employed in the regular way during the hours of service.

Mr. RYAN. The reasons are stated in this note, and it shows that by a comparison with other offices this is a reasonable request.

Mr. TAWNEY. In your recommendation did you state the number of calls they have to answer a day?

Mr. RYAN. The following is a statement, I am advised, of salaries paid telephone operators in other Departments and bureaus, and the number of telephones:

"Treasury Department, $1,200, eighty-seven telephones; Post-Office Department, $1,000, eighty-eight telephones; Government Printing Office, $1,200, eighty-five telephones; Census Office, $1,000, twenty-eight telephones; Pension Office, $1,800, thirty-one telephones."

Mr. EVANS. Since this statement was prepared the $1,800 clerk who was detailed for that work in the Pension Office has been dismissed, and they have one there now at $1,200.

Mr. RYAN. The Interior Department, $900, and 109 telephones—the largest number of any, I think.

Mr. TAWNEY. Right here in this city telephone operators, who work eight hours a day and receive a maximum salary of $38 a month, have to answer incoming calls at the rate of 200 an hour, and they get very efficient people to discharge the duties. The operator in no Department of the Government can answer as many calls or make as many connections as operators in the central station here in the city. But that is the fact. That is not the outgoing calls. They receive on the average 200 calls an hour. You can not base the compensation on the number of telephones; it is the number of calls.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman give the committee credit for the fact that they have sought to average the salaries paid to the telephone switch-board operators?

Mr. BURLESON. And instead of allowing $1,200 we have given $720.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought the gentleman was a lawyer. He loses the force of my argument. I am not talking about the pay of the telephone girls. I am trying to demonstrate here that these people are special pleaders, and I say your evidence shows it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] charged that I had misrepresented the facts. That is what I am talking about. They count the number of telephones in the various Departments, and they make demands according to number of telephones as compared with some other Department. My purpose in making these remarks is to substantiate what I said when I said that the heads of these bureaus and Departments were special pleaders for the people under them. I have nothing against them because they have the milk of human kindness in them. They are to be commended for that. From long association and friendship they become attached to these people and want to help them out; but, gentlemen, we represent the people of the United States. We have got to look to the proper and legitimate expenditure of the public money.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to ask my friend from South Carolina if he has any personal knowledge as to this particular clerk and his work and his efficiency?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; I said in my opening remarks that I did not know the clerk. I never saw him in my life. I have no personal feeling in the matter. I am taking the position I would take if the clerk were my brother.

Mr. RUCKER. Then if the gentleman believed that the work performed by the clerk was worth $2,500, and that that was a reasonable compensation for it, would he not favor paying that clerk $2,500?

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly would. I believe in paying people what their services are worth.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, I want to say to you that in this case the services of this clerk are worth $2,500.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw my amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PALMER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 16671. An act permitting the building of a dam across the St. Joseph River, near the village of Berrien Springs, Berrien County, Mich.;

H. R. 14808. An act authorizing the Choctawhatchee Power Company to erect a dam in Dale County, Ala.;

H. R. 5954. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate gold certificate, in lieu of one lost, to Lincoln National Bank, of Lincoln, Ill.; and

H. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution for the publication of eulogies delivered in Congress on Hon. John W. Cranford, late a Representative in Congress.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 20.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a survey and examination of the Passaic River, New Jersey, beginning at the Montclair and Greenwood Lake Railroad bridge to the present head of navigation at the city of Passaic, with a view to providing suitable navigation facilities for the needs of the city of Passaic.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask the permission of my colleague to make one statement. The gentleman from South Carolina misunderstood me. I said that he had no facts to stand on, referring to the hearings; I did not mean that he misstated the facts, but this hearing came too late to be put in the printed volume, and in this particular case, therefore, he had no facts by which to be guided. I did not mean to charge that he misstated the facts or that he misrepresented them. I hope that statement will satisfy the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. If there be no objection, it will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 110, in lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "chief law clerk, $2,500."

Mr. TAWNEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Did not the committee pass upon that last evening?

The CHAIRMAN. No; it was about being amended when the committee rose.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was cautious enough yesterday, Mr. Chairman, to ask the Chair if an amendment would be in order this morning. Mr. Chairman, this is a new office, one created by this appropriation bill. It is one that is placed in the bill solely by reason of the desire of the Committee on Appropriations to create this office and by the reason of the enforcement of the gag that was put upon the House yesterday by the passage and adoption of the extraordinary rule it remains in, although ordinarily subject to a point of order. In other words, here we have a new office created by this bill. It will not be called, if this provision passes, that the man, the proposed beneficiary of it, is now known, and that this chief law clerk is already picked out and slated to walk into the office the very next day after it becomes a law. That sort of legislation, Mr. Chairman, does not meet with my approval. Let us see what they have done in this bill. They have abolished four clerks or copyists at $900 each, little fellows, men who get the small salaries, men who do clerical work and, I have no doubt, faithful work. After increasing the service in this office——

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Is the gentleman from Georgia aware——

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I am aware. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON of Montana. That the law clerks in the Land Office every year pass upon more litigation, in more cases, of more value of property than the entire litigation in the State of Georgia?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not aware of any such thing.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. As a matter of fact they do.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman know how much is involved in the litigation in Georgia?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I know how much is involved in the Land Office. Does the gentleman know how much is involved in the Land Office?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will take the gentleman's word for it.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I should estimate that there were 4,000 cases a year tried in the Departments.

Mr. BARTLETT. And in the supreme court for the State of Georgia there were in one court 1,000 cases decided last year. This is the court of last resort, and there are 137 counties in the State. Last year there were 1,000 cases decided in the supreme court of Georgia alone.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. And that is one-fourth of the number decided in the Land Office.

Mr. BARTLETT. But that is only for the court of last resort. There are 137 counties, in which there are thousands of cases tried. The gentleman from Montana ought to be sure of his facts when he makes a statement.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I am.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think the gentleman has shown evidence of a knowledge of it.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Let me suggest this: The law clerks in the Land Office are practically the supreme court of the Land Office. They hear all the appeals coming up from 115 land offices, scattered all over the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that. We have for years been getting rid of public lands, disposing of them, and the cases now are of no greater number and of no greater importance than we have been having for past years.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. Does not the gentleman believe that the chief law clerk of the Land Department should be a good lawyer?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and I have an amendment to make him one.

Mr. RUCKER. Does not the gentleman believe that $2,500 is a moderate salary for a good lawyer?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think a good lawyer would be very loath to take a twenty-five-hundred-dollar salary in any office.

Mr. RUCKER. That is what I think. I think an amendment ought to be offered to make the salary $5,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, anyhow they are anxious enough for it and insist that the committee put it in. Some are so anxious that they are here waiting for the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman. I want a few minutes more, and then I am through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. I started, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to the fact when I was interrupted that this bill, according to the report of the Committee on Appropriations, cuts off the salary of four copyists at $900 each. It increases the salary of other officials, one by $250, and this law clerk at $2,500, so that there is an increase of $2,750 in the two offices. That is undertaken to be offset by the statement of fact that four little fellows, men who are copyists, are to be dispensed with. Now, as to this proposition to create this office, there is nothing stated in the report and nothing that I have been informed about to show the necessity of the creation of this office. The report of the committee on this bill does not state any reason why this new office should be created. Law questions are coming up, it is true; they have come up and been passed on in the past. I have made the motion to strike it out, because it has no place in this bill. This is not the place to create a new office, and without more apparent necessity than has been demonstrated, so far as I have been able to learn, I shall vote to strike out the provision.

Mr. RUCKER rose.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this paragraph end in five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put I desire to offer an amendment in case this amendment is not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. That opportunity will be given.

Mr. LITTAUER. And all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then put the question.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will change that motion and make it eight minutes instead of five. We surely must draw this discussion to a close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri for five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in accord with my friend from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] and my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] on the general proposition of indiscriminate raising of salaries. I do not believe this committee ought to vote into this bill any salary that is not merited, but I want to appeal to my friends here to be fair and reasonable about these matters and to direct their guns against those items that ought to be eliminated and not against those that ought to be retained. The gentleman says there are hordes of clerks seeking these places at reduced pay. I would say to him also that there are plenty of men in this House now today, who are anxious to return here, who can make more than the salary they now receive in the law business at home; so that that argument has no application. I believe that the position of chief clerk in the Land Office is one of the most important clerical positions held in the city of Washington in any Department. In my judgment, the man competent to fill that place, and who now fills a similar place in the Land Office, is in every sense worthy of the salary proposed in this bill—a thoroughly good lawyer, a painstaking, earnest, devoted official, a man who earns $2,500 as thoroughly and as completely as any man in this House earns the salary he gets, and, I might say, without reflecting on any gentleman, that he is as clearly entitled to it as we are to the salaries we draw, because he works three hundred and sixty-five days in a year for the people of the United States having business in the Land Office.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Oh, not three hundred and sixty-five in the year.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, well, I mean to count out the Sundays. Of course, as he is a good man, he goes to church on Sundays. Mr. Chairman, I would say more on this subject, because I am interested in it, and I hope every gentleman on this side as well as the other side will support it, but I desire to yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will not question the sincerity of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] in his efforts to strike out this provision providing for a chief law clerk. I do not doubt that the sole motive or purpose behind the gentleman's motion is to economize in the expenditure of public moneys. But I do feel that if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] were really advised as to the duties and responsibilities that are to be placed upon this new official that is being created he would not object to the item. As a matter of fact, coming before the law clerks of the Land Office for their consideration are from four to six hundred letters each day, raising a large number of legal questions which frequently must be passed upon by those law clerks before they are construed or passed upon by the courts. Now, gentlemen, as a matter of fact, the Assistant Commissioner of the Land Office has been discharging in the main these duties until this time, and he pleads for the creation of this place in order that he may be relieved of some of the burden of this great work and some of the responsibility. Now, I want to read for the information of the House, and especially for the information of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], because I am sure no other motive is behind this amendment of his other than to economize in the expenditures of public money, what the Assistant Commissioner-General of the Land Office says in support of the action your committee has taken. I read from the hearings. He says:

I would like to thoroughly explain what we have to do. For instance, we have anywhere from 400 to 600 letters and decisions going out every day. So far as the work of the office is concerned, I have been trying to take care of the legal part, and as far as the Commissioner is concerned he has been attending more particularly to the administrative features of it. Well, now, in answering so many letters every day I had to devise a scheme for having my attention called to every case in which the law clerks are in doubt and in every case in which there is a controversy arising between the law clerks themselves or between them and the writer of the opinion. Those cases come to me with their notes attached, setting forth their objections and authorities. I sift them out each day and go over them. With the attention I have to give to the public every day and the other matters of the office, no one man can do it without taking his work home at night. I have tried during the last three years, and I had some experience in the Land Office before I came here. I served four years as a law clerk, and I believe that in fairness to the officers, in fairness to the Commissioner and the Assistant Commissioner, and in justice to the business of the office, we ought to have this chief law clerk. We ought to have some man in whose ability we have confidence to handle these matters, who can go in and dig out these special matters.

I submit the matter to the House for its decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has just, by unanimous consent, limited debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto to eight minutes, and the Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] desires to offer a further amendment if this amendment be defeated, so as to have the three minutes on his second amendment. By unanimous consent, of course, the time of the gentleman may be extended. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17, page 110, after "law clerk," insert "who shall be a lawyer who has been admitted to practice at least five years prior to his appointment."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that motion is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. On that amendment the gentleman from New York makes the point of order that it changes existing law.

Mr. LITTAUER. That it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Georgia if there is at present any law requiring service at the bar for any specified period in order to become a law clerk of that Department?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; this is a chief law clerk, Mr. Chairman. There is no such office as chief law clerk. We are now creating the office of "chief law clerk," and I apprehend the point of order can not be made to a proposition, which proposition is entirely a new one, when the House offers to amend the proposition. You understand there is no law upon the statute book now in reference to a "chief law clerk" in this Department. It has been admitted, and we have heard that the sole purpose, according to the gentleman from Texas, was to better the service; that there was no other purpose behind anybody, although we have been informed and seen the purpose is to have some particular man appointed, who is already slated for the office, which the gentleman from Texas virtually admits because he does not deny it. Now, it would be a very remarkable proposition, speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, to say that the Committee on Appropriations could come in practically under a rule to enable them to legislate upon an appropriation bill, and then say that that legislation could not be amended. In other words, there is now no law upon the statute books fixing such an office as chief clerk of the Land Office, and this bill for the first time creates such office and fixes the salary. It occurs to me that the Chair very readily ought to draw a distinction which grows out of the peculiar situation in which we find ourselves by reason of the very extraordinary conditions under which we consider this bill; otherwise the Appropriations Committee could legislate at will, not permit an amendment to it, and there is no other way that we can legislate upon this now under the rule. The whole question of the chief clerk in the Land Office is new legislation, and ought to be subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York if it is conceded that this particular office is a new office created in this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly; I concede that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that in that event, this being entirely a new provision creating a new office, it is in order to define the qualifications of the office thus created. The paragraph is in violation of Rule XXI, but being permitted to remain in the bill without a point of order urged against it, it is in order to perfect the paragraph by a germane amendment. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, I ask to insert "admitted to practice in a court of record."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so changed and be again reported by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17, page 110, after "law clerk," insert "who shall be a lawyer who has been admitted to practice in a court of record at least five years prior to his appointment."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were—ayes 20, noes 43.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, if we want to pass this bill we should have a quorum present, and I make that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point that no quorum is present and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and six gentlemen are present, more than a quorum.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, is it too late to call for tellers now?

Mr. LITTAUER. Too late.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not ask you; I asked the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is still in order. The Chair thinks it is in order to demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from New York will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that he made a ruling a moment ago, in order to save time, upon what seemed to him to be the proper principle, without referring to the precedents. He now finds that ruling sustained by the precedents, it appearing on page 693 of the Manual:

The right to demand tellers is not waived by the fact that the Member demanding them has just made the point of no quorum and caused the Chair to count the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to ask unanimous consent, if I can submit a request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. JOHNSON. It having developed from the debate that the Assistant Land Commissioner and the chief clerk assume all the responsibility——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not recognized to argue——

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he would not consent to reduce the salary of the Land Commissioner?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a request for unanimous consent of the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill which it is not in the province of the Chair to put.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office: For the Commissioner of Pensions, $5,000; First Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; Second Deputy Commissioner, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,250; assistant chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $3,000; assistant medical referee, $2,250; 2 qualified surgeons who shall be experts in their profession, at $2,000 each; 32 medical examiners who shall be surgeons of education, skill, and experience in their profession, at $1,800 each; 5 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; law clerk, $2,250; chief of board of review, $2,250; 55 principal examiners, at $2,000 each; private secretary, to be selected and appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions, $2,000; 10 assistant chiefs of division, at $1,800 each; 3 stenographers, at $1,600 each; 69 clerks of class 4; 85 clerks of class 3; 300 clerks of class 2; 370 clerks of class 1; 200 clerks, at $1,000 each; 94 copyists; superintendent of building, $1,400; 2 engineers, at $1,200 each; 3 firemen; 27 messengers; 12 assistant messengers; 20 messenger boys, at $400 each; 43 laborers; 10 female laborers, at $400 each; 15 charwomen; 1 painter, skilled in his trade, $900; 1 cabinetmaker, skilled in his trade, $900; captain of the watch, $840; 3 sergeants of the watch, at $750 each; 20 watchmen; in all, $1,741,950.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 114, line 11, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "nine;" and on page 115, line 8, strike out the word "forty-one" and insert "forty-nine."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, where is that amendment?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will ask the clerk to read it again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to have an explanation.

Mr. LITTAUER. For the current year there are ten chiefs provided, and the bill proposes to cut the number down to five. That was a mistake. The Commissioner said he could get along without one of the ten, and we now make it nine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

No vacancy existing in the clerical or other classified service of the Pension Office, or which may occur after March 1, 1906, and prior to July 1, 1907, shall be filled by original appointment or by transfer from any office or bureau of the Department of the Interior. Nor shall any transfers from said Pension Office existing March 1, 1906, be returned to said office.

Mr. LITTAUER. I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 115, line 10, after the word "vacancy," insert the word "now;" and in line 13, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "six."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to know from the gentleman in charge of the bill something with reference to the reduction of the clerical force in the Pension Office. What is the fact about the reduction of the official force in the Pension Office?

Mr. LITTAUER. Now carried in this bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now carried in this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. According to the law adopted last year, we dropped out 33 of the clerical force that were detailed to the Interior Department and took them up where they were detailed to. That accounts for 33 of the 166 places dropped in the Pension Office. The Commissioner of Pensions stated to us that he does not propose to fill any vacancy.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What is the aggregate reduction in clerical force?

Mr. LITTAUER. With salaries of $161,300.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. One hundred and sixty-one thousand three hundred dollars.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a reduction of 166 in the clerical force and a reduction in salaries of $161,300.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. As I understand, it is expected that, by the policy of not filling the vacancies, at the commencement of the next fiscal year the force will naturally be reduced to the point recommended by the Commissioner?

Mr. LITTAUER. To the point recommended by him and incorporated in the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the effect of the amendment that is now pending is to change the paragraph so as to prevent the Commissioner from filling vacancies, only those vacancies that now exist; is it?

Mr. LITTAUER. We want to provide that vacancies that now exist shall not be filled, and also that clerks detailed away should not be put back in the interim.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If this amendment should not be adopted, the law would then permit the filling of any vacancy that may occur in the next fiscal year?

Mr. LITTAUER. If this provision should be adopted, under the course that the Commissioner of Pensions desires to follow, clerks who are detailed away from the Bureau can not be returned.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What I am trying to understand is——

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. LITTAUER. The object of the amendment is this: The paragraph originally read:

No vacancy existing.

We want to make it positive, and so we propose to make it read:

No vacancy now existing.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the significance of this amendment. The text now reads:

No vacancy existing in the clerical force shall be filled.

That would prohibit the Commissioner from filling any vacancy that might occur at any time during the next fiscal year; but with the amendment he is only prohibited from filling vacancies that now exist.

Mr. LITTAUER. That now exist, and that is the point of the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand.

Mr. MANN. Does the amendment which the gentleman now offers make this relate to the current fiscal year or to the ensuing fiscal year?

Mr. LITTAUER. The current year.

Mr. MANN. Supposing a clerk drops out of a higher class by promotion? For instance, you have provided here for nine chiefs of division.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; but those provisions would only go into effect after July 1 next. The paragraph we are now discussing relates entirely to vacancies. Of course during the time that these vacancies exist the positions can not be filled.

Mr. MANN. So that there will be no opportunity for promotions in the Department.

Mr. TAWNEY. The amendment does not have that effect.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the gentleman from Illinois that I was wrong in my last statement. The bill will read:

No vacancy now existing * * * shall be filled by original appointment or by transfer from any other office or bureau of the Department of the Interior.

So that there will be no original appointment and there will be no transfer into the Department, but if a vacancy should occur to-day in a $2,000 place an $1,800 clerk might be promoted thereto. There is nothing in this provision that would prevent that.

Mr. MANN. That would depend——

Mr. LITTAUER. It would depend upon the action of the Commissioner.

Mr. MANN. That would depend upon what the term "original appointment" means. It is an original appointment in one sense for a man to be promoted from an $1,800 place to a $2,000 place.

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe the Commissioner would understand what the intention is. In fact, he was a party to the framing of this amendment.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask this, so as to cover the matter at least in the RECORD, whether it was the intention to provide that there could be no promotional appointments?

Mr. LITTAUER. That was not the intention at all.

Mr. MANN. But simply to prevent an addition to the number of clerks.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes. We want the numerical strength to be kept as it is to-day.

Mr. MANN. Is the provision perfectly satisfactory to the Commissioner as the gentleman proposes to amend it?

Mr. LITTAUER. Entirely so; and, in fact, the amendments were proposed by the Commissioner.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the Pension Office has reached that point now where it can take care of the claims presented and at the same time properly decrease its force?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Commissioner states that the force can positively be decreased, and that he will continue to decrease it; that the work is practically, for the first time, current, and that he can take care of the work that is coming in with the force that he has now, and even with that force diminished by 100.

Mr. MANN. So it is not the intention by this provision in any way to delay the adjudication of pension claims?

Mr. LITTAUER. In no way; and there will be no delay.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless a separate vote is demanded, the question will be taken on the two amendments together.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For producing copies of drawings of the weekly issues of patents; for producing copies of designs, trade-marks, and pending applications; and for the reproduction of exhausted copies of drawings and specifications, $100,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 119, after the word "hundred," insert the words "and forty;" in line 3, after the word "dollars," insert "Provided, That the act of January 12, 1895, shall not apply to this and the preceding paragraph."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman from Minnesota would explain the necessity for that amendment. In reading the preceding paragraph I was impressed with the notion that the publication of the Official Gazette was an expensive luxury, and I wondered if it was necessary that it be continued, or if the country was getting the full equivalent for the money that was invested in its publication and distribution. This paragraph seems to be a part of the other, and it seems that it costs $200,000 a year for the publication of that magazine.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the paragraph that has just been read does not relate to the publication of the Gazette. This is for producing copies of drawings, designs, trade-marks, irrespective of the patents. The preceding paragraph is for photolithographing plates and illustrations for the Official Gazette, $70,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; for the Official Gazette, $130,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. The paragraph I am now amending is for producing copies of drawings for the weekly issue of the Patent Gazette, designs of trade-marks, and reproduction of exhausted copies of drawings and specifications, $140,000. I will say, in respect to the paragraph under consideration, that we supposed in making up the bill that $100,000, in view of the provision as to the manner in which this work was to be done, that it would not require more than $100,000. The estimate was $140,000. The Commissioner of Patents, as soon as the bill was printed and he discovered that we had allowed only $100,000, communicated at once with the committee and said that it was a mistake; that they would require at least $140,000. I have his letter here, and I will read that portion of it:

I beg to call your attention to the fact that the question of removal of the Official Gazette from the Government Printing Office would not affect the last item above quoted and for which an appropriation of $130,000 was made for the year ending June 30, 1906, and for which an increase of $10,000 was submitted. This item has been reduced to $100,000 in the bill as reported, and I am of the opinion that this amount will not suffice for the purposes of this office. The expenditures under this item have been as follows: For the year 1903–4, $129,999.97, the appropriation being $100,000 in the legislative appropriation bill and $30,000 in the general deficiency bill. The next year, 1904–5, $140,000 was appropriated and expended for this purpose, $100,000 being in the legislative bill and $40,000 in the deficiency bill. For the current fiscal year, 1905–6, $130,000 is provided by the legislative appropriation bill, and an increase has been submitted of $10,000 to bring this up to the amount expended the preceding year.

This does not involve the publication of the Gazette. The Gazette is not paid out of this appropriation at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Education: For Commissioner of Education, $3,500; chief clerk, $1,800; statistician, $1,800; specialist in charge of land-grant college statistics, $1,800; translator, $1,800; collector and compiler of statistics, $2,400; specialist in foreign educational systems, $1,800; specialist in educational system, $1,800; two clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; seven clerks of class 1; five clerks, at $1,000 each; six copyists; two copyists, at $800 each; copyist, $720; skilled laborer, $840; one assistant messenger; two laborers; three laborers, at $480 each; laborer, $400; in all, $54,940.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to get some information from the committee. I notice here that the chief clerk of the Bureau of Education is paid $1,800. I notice under the head of Patent Office the chief clerk is paid $2,500. I notice under the Indian Office schedule the chief clerk is paid $3,000, and another clerk, called a "financial clerk," is paid $2,250. I notice under the head of the General Land Office the chief clerk is paid $2,500. I notice that in the "office of Secretary," likewise under the head of the Interior Department, the chief clerk is paid $2,500. Going back of that, the chief clerk of the Bureau of Yards and Docks is paid $2,000. I will not go further back, as I intended only to follow it through the Department of the Interior.

The chief clerk here in the Bureau of Education is paid $1,800. I notice that several clerks under him—three of them—are getting the same salary, and it struck me that perhaps the fact that the chief clerk in the Bureau of Education was a Georgian, a Democrat, and had come up here in 1893, had made an excellent officer, serving all that time without being discharged even under a Republican administration, could not have had anything to do with this neglect of the committee to promote him while promoting all these other "chief clerks," or if it had anything to do with it the committee would inform me of it.

The chief clerk of the Bureau of Education is not only chief clerk, but acts as Commissioner of Education in the absence of the Commissioner, and has to act very frequently, because the Commissioner is away a good deal. I do not want to make any plea based upon the kind of plea that was made in one of Dickens's novels by a man who was running for warden on the ground that he had "seven small children and many orphans" depending on him, but this man's necessities are as great, his excellencies are as great, his ability is as great, and I do not know of any difference between him and the other "chief clerks," except that he is a Democrat. I thought I would move to strike out the last word in order to ask for some explanation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that when we came to this item in the estimates of the Bureau of Education there wasn't a single thing asked for; there was no increase suggested by the head of the Bureau, and, as a matter of course, we just put the item in, it being current law. I want to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I did not know that the chief clerk was a Democrat, and didn't know he was from Georgia.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say further, in answer to the question, the Committee on Appropriations did not know what the politics of this gentleman was, nor did we ever inquire; and had we known that he was a Democrat, and the gentleman from Georgia had requested an increase on that ground, he might probably have secured an increase on that ground, which would, perhaps, have satisfied the distinguished leader of the minority on that side. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I did not mean seriously to charge the committee with having had knowledge of this gentleman's politics, and having for that reason left him out. I did mean to call the attention of the House and of the country, however, to the fact that where a fellow happens to be a Democrat he is not recommended for promotion; this with all your boasted civil-service impartiality.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to give him some information?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just one other word. I understand it to be true that the Secretary of the Interior recommended that all of the chief clerks in his Department be put up at $2,250, or be made uniform in their pay.

Mr. TAWNEY. The chiefs of divisions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have also understood that it was a part of the policy of the Committee on Appropriations—and a very just and proper policy, in my opinion—to equalize the salaries of people of the same classification as near as possible by reducing some that were too high and by increasing others that were too low, and making those of the same class or performing the same duties receive the same pay. I shall therefore ask to move that this gentleman's salary be placed at the lowest amount that is given the other chief clerk in that or any other Department, which, as near as I can find, is $2,250. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi began his speech for the purpose of asking for some information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. And he seems to have concluded now and does not care for the information, but proposes to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am waiting for it now. Just as I received it I commented upon it, and I am ready to receive some more and comment upon that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Bureau of Education has in it twenty clerks. The Patent Office, with which he compares the Bureau of Education, has 740 clerks, presided over by a chief clerk, and the Patent Office collects $1,250,000 of revenue annually. It would naturally seem, therefore, to a reasonable minded man that a man who has that responsibility in respect to the handling of so many people and the collection of so much money would perform services that would be of very much greater value to the Government than the chief clerk of the Bureau of Education, who has only twenty clerks to look after, and who does nothing at all in the way of the expenditure of money except to supervise the expenditure of the small appropriation made by Congress for that Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words as an amendment to the former amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Mississippi will continue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the explanation, and it contained a great deal of meat of information, but it does not account for the difference between $1,800 and $2,500. It might account for the fact that this gentleman might be paid somewhat less than $2,500, but I do not think that it quite accounts for this immense difference of $750 upon a basis of $1,800. So it seems to me that this chief clerk ought to get what the lowest salary of the chief clerks is—about $2,000. I did not propose to make him receive a salary of $2,500, equal with the clerk of the Patent Office.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the hearings show that in one Department they ask for a chief clerk at $2,000, who had only six clerks under him.

Mr. LITTAUER. But that was not recommended in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am very glad to get that information from the gentleman from South Carolina in one sense, because it reenforces my argument, and very sorry to get it in another sense, because it also reenforces my idea of bad and partisan management in the Departments. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendments, and now move to increase the salary of the chief clerk in the Bureau of Education from $1,800 to $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 119, lines 13 and 14, strike out "one thousand eight hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two thousand."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, surely the gentleman is not going to treat me in that way.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, let the House vote upon it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Very well, I withdraw the point of order in deference to the distinguished leader on the other side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I thought the gentleman would do that after a while, because we are all operating now under a rule without points of order on nearly everything.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman [laughter], I am in favor of the amendment, but I am going to offer an amendment to the amendment to strike out "eighteen hundred" and insert "two thousand." That raises him $200. Now, Mr. Chairman, there was not a word said in the committee about this clerk. There was nothing but a straight estimate made there, and on that estimate we had no hearings.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Chief of the Bureau of Education was before the committee, and he made no recommendation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I know; I said that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman, a member of the committee, think that we should act here without any recommendation at all from the Bureau chief or the Department?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am going to state just why we should do it. Now, neither the subcommittee nor the whole committee of the Committee on Appropriations had this matter before them at all, and I want to say, in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that I do not think I ever voted in the Appropriations Committee either to increase or reduce a salary knowing a man's politics or caring a thing about it. I did not know this man. I did not even know he was from my State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I made no charge of that at all. I merely wanted the House and country to see how matters of recommendation for increases of salary—for promotion—comes before the committees.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There was no recommendation coming; but, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from New York, it comes to our knowledge now that here is a man who is called a "chief clerk," who is on the roll as chief clerk, and there is not another chief clerk in a single Department in Washington that I know of who is working for so little as $1,800 a year.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you know now about the duties of this man's work—how wide his duties are?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then it does not seem to me——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the gentleman from Georgia knows he is doing the work of a "chief clerk;" and I can tell you he came here in 1893, and he could not have stayed here under all these political vicissitudes unless it was that he did that work well.

Mr. TAWNEY. But I can tell you that the chief clerk of this bureau has received but $1,800 since 1877.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I admit all that, Mr. Chairman; he has never received more than $1,800.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not right now. The Committee on Appropriations has never investigated to see whether he was worth that or $900 or $2,000, and I take it for granted, and I think I am justified, that this man does clerical work and general correspondence throughout the country touching upon and relating to the question of education. I take it for granted he does that, and I know I am justified in that. Now, if he does that and nothing more I think he ought to have $2,000, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will prevail.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that the Chief of the Bureau of Education estimated for this man for the coming fiscal year at $1,800. That salary is all the salary he has received since the office was created, in 1877, and now the gentleman from Georgia admits that he does not know anything about what his duties are, what his responsibilities are, and in the face of the fact that he is entirely ignorant, according to his own statement, of the character of the services he is rendering, and in the face of the fact that the man has not asked for the increase, he proposes—I would not say because he was a Democrat—to increase the gentleman's salary from $1,800 to $2,000, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the chairman of the committee will permit me to make one suggestion, I think you have learned since the bill was made up that the man was too modest to make the request.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman, from what he says and what we have heard here, that there are two things he did not know when they made up the bill. One is that this clerk is a Democrat, and the other is that he comes from the gentleman's State.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not know either.

Mr. NORRIS. You did not recommend it in the committee, but since getting that information you recommend this increase of salary.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not put it upon that ground.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear some better reason than has been advanced so far in order to justify me in supporting this amendment. The only argument that has been made up to date in favor of increasing the salary of the chief clerk of the Bureau of Education is that he is a Democrat in politics.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do you think that since this man's politics have been disclosed that he will be likely to hold his job long, anyway?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I was wondering whether the gentleman from Mississippi did a real kindness to this official in advertising to the country the fact that he is a Democrat, when we remember the number of patriots who are willing to go into the public service. Now, I want to say this: I assume that differences are made in salaries in view of different character of services—different responsibilities which devolve upon the men holding the positions. Anyone, I think, can readily see that the chief clerk of the Patent Office requires more knowledge of an expert character than the ordinary clerical officer. The Bureau of Education is a statistical bureau at best. It contributes nothing whatever to the revenues of the Government, of course, as does the Bureau of Patents, and its work is purely statistical, and the work of the chief clerk must be purely of a clerical character. I suppose that a clerk out of class 4, perhaps, has been promoted to the dignity of chief clerk, and performs the service of chief clerk. The duties are purely clerical; no expert knowledge is required, no special skill is demanded for the position, and no recommendation has been made for the increase of salary. The incumbent of the office himself, so far as I know, has no desire, or rather expectation, of an increase of his salary; and it seems to me that the House can hardly support the amendment upon the ground solely that the incumbent is a Democrat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just a word, and I will yield. It may be that if the gentleman would offer an amendment providing that the salary shall be $200 in addition to that fixed by the law as long as the incumbent is a Democrat, that the amendment would command more consideration. It would at least disclose the real reason for the increase.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will allow me, simply to correct what he seems to think my position; I did not ask that he be promoted simply because he is a Democrat, but suggested that he had been left unpromoted simply because he was a Democrat. All these other fellows—"chief clerks"—have been promoted, or a good many of them, I have found out; and the gentleman from South Carolina informs me that in one instance a chief clerk is receiving $2,000 and has only six clerks under him. This is the Bureau of Education, and ought to be the most intelligent bureau and require the most expert knowledge.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had investigated the question, he might have found some other reason for the distinction in salaries. He says he has found none. But perhaps he has made no investigation to determine whether they are of such a character as to justify this distinction.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to a question.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it not a fact, in connection with the majority of this House, that it pays more attention to commercialism than it does to education?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a proposition that I do not think I ought to be required to answer publicly; but I simply state that if this amendment prevails it is on account of the politics of the incumbent. I would a good deal rather have the provision made that it should be $2,000, so long as the incumbent is a Democrat than upon the ground of alleged discrimination. The assumption of the gentleman from Mississippi, that it is because of the officer's politics that he is discriminated against is not sufficiently established to the House to justify an increase of the appropriation. We ought to have something more than a mere assumption to justify it, in the absence of proof that a Democrat per se is worth that much more than an ordinary citizen.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman think to put this language into the law "as long as filled by a Democrat" would encourage this individual to continue in wrongdoing?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am fearful it might.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Oh, no; not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has offered an amendment that has been reported. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the proposed amendment the words "two thousand two hundred and fifty" and insert "two thousand."

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was my amendment. My amendment was $2,000, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary, traveling, and other miscellaneous and emergency expenses, including a per diem in lieu of subsistence, not exceeding $4 per day, of confidential agents appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations and examinations in special cases, to be expended at his discretion and under his authority and approval, to be immediately available, $10,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask for some information, and perhaps later to offer an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, some time ago we appropriated $500,000 to be used as a trust fund to prosecute trust formers—not to much effective purpose, I admit—and to execute the antitrust law. Later on we found we had a Secretary of the Interior who was executing the laws of the country out of a contingent fund without waiting for special prodding or special legislation, and doing it with magnificent courage, watchfulness, integrity, and success. The provision which has just been reported, Mr. Chairman, is for—

Salary, traveling, and other miscellaneous and emergency expenses, including a per diem in lieu of subsistence, not exceeding $4 per day, of confidential agents—appointed by the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations and examinations in special cases, to be expended at his discretion and under his authority and approval, to be immediately available, $10,000.

I ask attention of gentlemen to this—

Now, under this appropriation the Secretary of the Interior has had indicted four members of the National Legislature, of this body and the other; two of them have been convicted and others are still undergoing trial. The Secretary of the Interior appeared before the Committee on Appropriations, and on page 423 of the hearings I find the following. The Secretary of the Interior said:

While we are on the subject, I have asked for a special appropriation of $10,000 for a contingent fund. My purpose is simply to do this: If any one of these men is sent around into a division and he is known to be there for special duty he can not get the information that is wanted.

Mr. LITTAUER. Have you not drawn upon the secret service?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir; not upon the secret service; we have drawn upon the contingent fund—the fund for the protection of the public lands. We have had to discharge some of these special agents in order to use the money where it was most necessary.

Mr. LITTAUER. Your comments apply strictly to the submission of $10,000, on page 209 of the bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. You need all this money for that purpose?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir; absolutely. The mistake I made was that I did not double the estimate. We have one case where parties have stolen 265,000 acres of land in California. We are working up that case. We have not enough money to-day, but we are doing the best we can do.

Mr. BURLESON. Could you use an appropriation of $20,000, instead of $10,000, in the apprehension of persons connected with land frauds?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir. You take the Indian Territory and you take another State and we ought to have three times that amount of money for just this detective work, which is absolutely necessary.

Mr. LITTAUER. In regard to the contingent expenses, wherein the law is becoming more stringent year after year, first as to apportionment and then as to expenditures, have you amply provided for what you believe to be the needs of your Department?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. With that exception. This sum of $10,000 for this special purpose is absolutely insignificant as compared with the hundreds of thousands of acres we have saved and will save by this service to the United States Government.

I skip down the line a little:

Mr. TAWNEY. Is he paid—

This refers to one of these special agents—out of the fund for the protection of the public lands?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. When you got this man did he have any special fitness for this particular work?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He was recommended as having the qualifications, and he has demonstrated it beyond any question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you think it would have been possible to have gone to an outside agency and procured the services of a man equally as good?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, sir. I speak from experience. He knows his business up to the handle. He is a remarkable man, an exceptional man. He has been offered a great deal more money than we have been paying him, and he refused the offers because of his loyalty to the Department and because of the interest he has taken in this work. He has developed these frauds.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to revert to the $10,000 item. I understood you to say that if the amount could be doubled that you would be able to apprehend more persons who have been guilty of land frauds and save more public lands than if we should allow only the $10,000?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTAUER. Do you now recommend that that estimate be increased more than $10,000?

Mr. HITCHCOCK—

This is your Secretary of the Interior, gentlemen, a man who has shown remarkable courage and ability in finding out crookedest things that are going on amongst your public servants; a man concerning whose integrity and enterprise as an officer in encouraging honesty and discouraging dishonesty no man has raised a voice of criticism. He says:

I respectfully ask for at least $20,000. I know the money can not be spent for a better purpose.

The committee gave him $10,000 instead of the $20,000 he asked. Now, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the formal amendment with the consent of the committee, and I offer an amendment to strike out the word "ten," in line 6, page 122, and to substitute in lieu thereof the word "twenty," so that a Republican Congress can grant a Republican Secretary what he says he needs to hunt out, run down, and bring to condign punishment land thieves and depredators.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 122, in line 6, strike out the word "ten" and insert "twenty."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, your committee was in grave doubt as to what was best to do, in connection with the statement of the Secretary of the Interior. We were in thorough accord with all of his purposes and his fearless, conscientious, and able conduct in looking into the investigations that have brought about that serious result. The reason we recommended the $10,000 in this bill, in view of the fact that the Secretary subsequently asked for $20,000, was that when we came to consider the matter we found there was a fund of $250,000 which was actually at the service of the Secretary of the Interior, provided in the sundry civil bill, for the protection of the public lands, and under that appropriation 100 agents, selected without reference to the civil-service regulations, were at the service of the Secretary of the Interior for practically the same kind of work.

Now, the Secretary has conducted the investigations which have led to the result to which the gentleman from Mississippi has referred without any appropriation whatever of this kind. He has simply found one or two men of exceptional ability whom he desired to join to his forces permanently, and therefore he suggests to us this appropriation. I do not believe that in his investigations in the past he has been to any extent curtailed by lack of funds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Secretary of the Interior says here, if the gentleman will excuse me, that he made a mistake in not asking for double the amount.

Mr. LITTAUER. I realize that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He says that "he has not money enough," and that "we are doing the best we can," and he says he "needs $10,000 more;" and certainly he is better acquainted with what it costs to do this work than we are, and what work is to be done. He adds that he "is paying this out of the contingent fund."

Mr. LITTAUER. He is paying it out of the contingent fund, and I believe also has drawn on this fund for the protection of the public lands against depredation; if not for this particular service, then for services in connection with the same investigation. Now, I do not want to oppose the gentleman's amendment at all——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then let us pass it. Let us not discourage anybody who is engaged in prosecuting wrongdoers.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have no desire to discourage anybody who is engaged in this work.

Mr. NORRIS. I concur with the gentleman fully that we ought not to curtail the Secretary in making these investigations. As I understand, in these cases up to this time he has made the investigations without any appropriations in this bill, and what is the necessity of our appropriating any amount now, for he already has at his disposal all the money he needs?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will tell you why; it is in the hearings. It is because we are beginning to question this use of funds at the direction of these officers.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no diversion there.

Mr. LITTAUER. There has been no real diversion of the funds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that. Here is this language. Mr. LITTAUER says that in regard to the contingent expenses wherein the law has become more stringent year after year as to appropriations and then as to expenditures, and the Secretary does not want any doubt as to the fact of his right to use those funds.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true the appropriation of $20,000 will be absolutely too low. I mean if he could not use any money except what is appropriated in this bill, $20,000 will not begin to be enough.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman misunderstands the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the gentleman to say the reason why we should appropriate is because of the stringency that is going on as to the use of funds.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but not all of this.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is any stringency that would prohibit him from using the other item of $250,000, if it is true, as the gentleman intimates, for the support of this amendment that he can not use the $250,000, then we ought to appropriate $10,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the gentleman does not understand the Secretary, or what I understand to be the position. There is no doubt about the use of the $250,000 for certain purposes—inspectors of public lands and various things; but what he wants of this is for a secret fund for a detective force.

Mr. NORRIS. He has under the other fund 100 men not selected through the civil service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are on the rolls of the Department carried over here, and what he wants is a detective force.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman read the testimony of the Secretary where he describes a man that he has selected himself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. His name was not disclosed?

Mr. NORRIS. His name was not disclosed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He wants men whose names do not have to be carried on the rolls and who do not have to be disclosed.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to read the testimony of the Secretary of the Interior that he had to lay off some of the agents employed under the large fund in order to utilize the money saved by those salaries.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand that. I did not hear anything of the kind. I do not dispute the gentleman from Illinois by any means, but if there was any such testimony I didn't hear it.

Mr. MANN. That is the way I understood the reading of the testimony; that he had saved money out of that fund by the dismissal of certain agents.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will not prevail. The Secretary of the Interior during the past few years has been conducting investigations into alleged land frauds and has discovered many frauds in the administration of our public land laws. He has secured by aid of testimony the indictment of a great many—I think some 600—and, if my memory serves me correctly, the conviction of a large number. All of that investigation has been conducted under existing law and paid for out of the appropriation made by Congress for the purpose of protecting the public domain.

In that investigation he has employed one secret-service man. All the rest of the investigation has been conducted by special agents and inspectors in the Interior Department. All that the Secretary estimated to be necessary for this particular service was $10,000. With that he has been able to secure all the secret-service men that he desired and all that is necessary. In his testimony before the committee, when he found that certain Members, as a result of the investigation, were in favor of appropriating more, and he found there was an opportunity perhaps to increase this appropriation, he gave testimony to the effect that he might utilize more men. I have no doubt the heads of Departments, if allowed a free hand in the matter of employing secret-service men, could employ a great many more than they do to-day.

I want to call to the attention of the committee the fact that under existing law the Secretary of the Interior has $250,000 available, if he sees fit to use it, for all the investigations necessary, or any investigation that he may deem necessary, in respect to these alleged land frauds. I read:

To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the laws and rules relating to the cutting thereof, of protecting lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, and of adjusting claims for swamp lands and indemnity for swamp lands, $250,000.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if this is for the purpose of building up the secret service in connection with the Interior Department of our Government, then let the appropriation so specify, and also that there should be more reason given for extending and broadening the secret-service force of the Government than has been presented either before the committee or before the House for that purpose. There is absolutely no limitation upon the Secretary of the Interior with respect to the expenditure of this $250,000, no limitation or restriction whatever. These agents and inspectors can be employed, not under the civil service, but in the discretion of the Secretary, and I was unable to see, and am now, why it was necessary to make a specific estimate for the appropriation for the employment of secret-service men in view of the appropriation and the provisions of the appropriation in respect to the protection of the public domain which now exists on the statute books. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to make an inquiry or two of the gentleman from Minnesota. I would ask him if he objects to increasing the appropriation over what it has been heretofore because the Secretary of the Interior wants to employ a secret service?

Mr. TAWNEY. He has never had an appropriation for this service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman not think he needs it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am willing to give him what he estimated to be necessary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much was that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Ten thousand dollars; and we have reported in favor of his estimate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And now the contest is about increasing that $10,000 more, is it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. The amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is to increase it $10,000. But I say in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that in view of the large amount that is available for the protection of the public domain there is no necessity for Congress increasing the amount beyond $10,000, that being the amount which the Secretary himself estimated was all that was needed for this particular service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that the Secretary says that was a mistake in not asking for more and wants to correct this error and also because he needs the money. But let this be an error or not, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this, that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has already stated, and no one will dispute it, that the Secretary of the Interior has vigorously in the last year prosecuted these land frauds, and he has caused indictments to be had. If the gentleman would only come to the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands, of which I happen to be a member, when we have any particular matter before that committee, he will hear of more land frauds, more land thieves, than he has ever heard of before in his life. And all this is without the slightest dispute of the truth of the charge. A man makes an allegation about an individual or about these land frauds and nobody disputes it. The gentleman himself admits that the Secretary has caused to be had about 600 indictments already. It is also stated in these Land Committee hearings that the law has not been enforced there at any time until the last twelve months.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit an inquiry?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is the gentleman not aware of the fact that all of this development has been brought about by the force of special agents and inspectors in the employ of the Interior Department?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Which the Secretary of the Interior now has under his command?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then why is it necessary for Congress to authorize an appropriation for the purpose of establishing a secret-service bureau in connection with the Interior Department of the Government?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We do not say a secret-service bureau, but I am not going to stand back on $10,000 when the great Secretary of the Interior, who has proved himself an efficient officer, says he wants $10,000 more for a certain purpose, though it be a secret service to investigate these frauds. The work is not half completed, if half I hear is true. It is hard to ferret out these frauds. There are more rascals trying to get hold of these public lands than you ever dreamt of in your philosophy. Mr. Chairman, we did not find out very much about the trusts of this country until we appropriated $500,000 at the instance of the Democrats in this House and put that money in the hands of the Attorney-General to expend it in the execution of that law. As soon as we gave him that, then he proceeded to enforce the law more vigorously than ever before. Now, here, when a brother Cabinet officer, the Secretary of the Interior, comes here and asks Congress to give him $10,000 more, or $20,000, if you please, to employ a secret-service agency, to employ a sheriff, to employ an extra marshal, or to employ anything that he in his wisdom deems proper after an experience of twelve months of hard work with those people out there, with these land thieves and land frauds, why should we stand back here on that sum if by its use the Secretary can more fully and completely and successfully enforce the law?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have given him all that he asks for, and does not this bill carry exactly the amount he estimated to be necessary for that purpose?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that he wants $10,000 more.

Mr. TAWNEY. He has not estimated for $10,000 more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is true that the Secretary of the Interior did first ask for $10,000, or that got in his estimate, but it is also true, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], of course, does not deny it, that he appeared in person before the committee and asked for $10,000 more, and that he said he needed it, and he said he had to discharge a part of his other force or take the money that was intended for the balance of his other force in order to pay these men on the outside. Furthermore, if the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will demonstrate in a minute (the gentleman from Minnesota did not read all the law), there is a restriction upon the use of that $250,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from New York will read it after a moment. It limits so much a day to be paid, and he can not get skilled expert detectives such as are required for his purposes for the amount.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, gentlemen of the committee, I had the pleasure of calling yesterday or the day before upon and talking with the Secretary of the Interior. He is struggling with all his might and main to enforce our laws against land frauds. He is a good officer, and if not he ought to be turned out of the Cabinet. We have gone by his recommendation heretofore. For twelve months he has been struggling out there with a great wilderness of land thieves, and after a year of experience in Congress and out of it he comes here and says, "I want more money; I want $10,000 more to execute this law more vigorously and in a different way than heretofore."

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. You, as well as the Secretary of the Interior, well know that all estimates for appropriations under the law must be submitted by heads of Departments to the Secretary of the Treasury, who submits them to the House through the Speaker.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I did not know that the Speaker did that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. And if the Secretary under the law deemed it necessary to appropriate $20,000 for this service, when he was making a submission of his estimates in accordance with the law, why did he put in $10,000 instead of $20,000?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did he not appear before the committee?

Mr. TAWNEY. He did.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, he did not go by way of the Speaker and get permission, did he?

Mr. TAWNEY. The law expressly provides heads of Departments must submit their estimates for appropriations through the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury submits them to Congress through the Speaker and the President of the Senate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. After he, as the gentleman said, went to the Speaker and submitted his programme, something I never heard of before, after that, then your committee in its wisdom sent for this man; they saw what he had been doing and they saw the good work he had been doing, and they sent for him; he quits his great office and comes before your committee and says he wants $10,000 more for a particular purpose, and I for one am going to stand here and vote to give it to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Interior has been investigating gross frauds in the land offices, and in the course of his investigation he has found it necessary to employ men other than his regular force of inspectors. The regular inspectors of the Land Office have become so well known that it is impossible for them to do the detective work required. It appears that one or two men whom he has employed have been receiving $5 a day and one man $10 a day. He estimated that in order to continue this work he would require $10,000, and then he stated that that was a mistake, and he would require at least $20,000. It seems to me if he should have anything, Mr. Chairman, for work of this character, involving secret inspection, requiring detective skill of the highest character, that it would be proper to give him the entire sum asked. The $250,000 allowed for the prevention of land frauds and for the protection of the public domain restricts the per diem to be paid to these inspectors to $3 a day. It may be that in connection with this provision that it has been so construed that some of the necessary expenses incurred by these men of special skill exceeded $3 a day, and for that reason they could not be reimbursed out of this found. If that be the reason for this special appropriation, it seems to me that the Secretary should have all that he asks. If it be unnecessary, he should not receive anything. It is undoubtedly true that there have been greater frauds and greater scandals unearthed in connection with entries upon the public domain during the past two years than during the rest of the existence of the Government. The Secretary of the Interior has conscientiously performed the duties of his office. He has in a large degree stopped these frauds.

He stated to the committee that in a State in which it is not suspected fraud has been committed; the investigation there disclosed that more frauds in these land cases have been committed in that State than in any of the States already mentioned. These are matters that it is necessary should be kept confidential, and not disclosed to the public; to do so will prevent him unraveling wrongs and punishing the wrongdoers. If it be necessary that he should have in his office a skilled force of detectives to do this important work, it seems to me, while I dislike to disagree with the committee, that if the committee giving the ten thousand asked would have given $20,000. If that had been originally asked, upon the statement of the Secretary that he had made a mistake, and that he required the additional $10,000, there should be no hesitation whatever in granting this sum. It is necessary that this investigation be pursued now, and not at a future day, because under the laws of the country unless prosecutions are conducted within a certain time they are barred under the statute of limitation. If the Secretary has reason to suspect that there are frauds committed upon the people of the country to the enormous extent indicated by him in his statement, then there should be no hesitation in giving him every assistance and all the means required to bring the offenders to account and stop the stealing of the public land. The work should not be stopped nor impeded because the Government has not the funds nor the assistance required to prevent these frauds.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish that the gentleman in charge of the bill would see their way, or his way, toward the acceptance of this amendment. The Secretary of the Interior has been engaged for some time past, very successfully, in ferreting out land frauds. I do not know whether he needs a little more money or not—Congress perhaps may not know. It may be that the Committee on Appropriations in recommending the amount of $10,000 is correct; but the Secretary of the Interior has stated that he could use $20,000. Let it be remembered on our side of the House that we have the responsibility of government, and if we fail to place in the hands of our officials money necessary to ferret out fraud, which we may be responsible for, the country will properly say that we have failed in our duty.

The President confides to the Secretary of the Interior the duty of ferreting out these frauds. In my judgment it would be a serious mistake not to confer upon him both the money and the power with which to pursue his investigation. The gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman that this $10,000 is a new item. The Secretary of the Interior has from another fund made a secret-service investigation out there that he was pleased with, and in his estimate he asked for $10,000. When he came into the committee room, and under the impulse of another atmosphere——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will have to decline to yield to the gentleman further unless I can have more time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will get you the time. I only want to state the facts. It was suggested to him he might use more. He said: "Yes." I want to say to you candidly that this $10,000 was for the purpose of making an experiment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, a very distinguished member of the Committee on Appropriations states, that impulsively, impulsively——

Mr. TAWNEY. That is right.

Mr. MANN. Impulsively the Secretary of Interior, in the Committee on Appropriations, increased the amount from $10,000 to $20,000. Mr. Chairman, I dare say that if there be a man in Washington who is not controlled by impulse, whose blood is as cold as that of a fish, it is the Secretary of Interior. [Laughter and applause.] And because he is cold he has pursued this investigation. No one can make me think that "impulsively," under the influence of the Committee on Appropriations, he raised the amount. Mr. Chairman, I can well understand how an impulsive man going into the Committee on Appropriations and feeling the ice water which they poured down his back would reduce the amount from $20,000 to $10,000, but no gentleman ever going into that committee has had the amount raised from impulse by contact with the members—the very careful members of that committee—and I think that is greatly to their credit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota has stated that there was a fund of $250,000 which the Secretary of the Interior could use.

In a colloquy a few moments ago I called the attention of the House to the fact that the Secretary could not use any portion of that money without cutting off some special agents, and that was questioned; but I have the hearing before me in which the Secretary makes the statement. He said:

We have drawn upon the contingent fund, the fund for the protection of the public lands.

That is the fund to which reference was made.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not the fund to which I referred, however.

[The time of Mr. MANN having expired, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. MANN. He says:

We have had to discharge some of these special agents in order to get the money where it was most necessary.

In other words, the Secretary of the Interior, in the pursuit of the investigation of these land frauds, has had to discharge special agents whom he had employed by name in order to employ other special agents who were not known.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the amount is not large, but the principle is very important. Shall the Government, shall the House, give to the Secretary of the Interior, engaged in fighting the most tremendous frauds which have ever been attempted against the Government, the money which he says he needs, or shall we defend and protect the men who have been engaged in robbing the public domain?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that after this very same committee, that is now bringing in this bill, had made the usual appropriation for the Department of Justice, owing to the exigencies of the case, we appropriated here, without any opposition, $500,000 to enforce the antitrust law? And yet now they are kicking because we ask for an extra $10,000 for the Land Office.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me to correct him, the Committee on Appropriations did not report that bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I excuse the committee from having reported it; but, as a matter of fact, we did pass the $500,000 appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism of the Committee on Appropriations. I think they made the appropriation here as large as they were warranted in doing. That was the amount of the estimate. That was all the Committee on Appropriations ought to bring before the House; but the House itself, knowing the circumstances of this particular case, ought, as it has in many other cases, to increase the amount because it is necessary. The Committee on Appropriations would have been subject to criticism if it had offered a larger amount; but the House has the right, and, in my opinion, it is the duty of the House to give to the Secretary of the Interior the money which he says he can use in further pursuit of these frauds.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who says that there are certain limitations attaching to this appropriation of $250,000 which make it unavailable for the investigation of land frauds, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is no limitation whatever in the proviso which follows that portion of the section that I read, except as to the per diem allowance and for subsistence of the men employed under this provision. The proviso reads:

That agents and others employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior and allowed per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day each, and actual necessary expenses for transportation, including necessary sleeping car fare.

He may pay these special agents $25 a day if he sees fit. There is no limitation under the law making that appropriation that would restrict the right of the Secretary of the Interior to pay the agent any compensation that he saw fit; but his per diem allowance and traveling expenses are fixed by the statute. Beyond that there is no limitation whatever.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I realize as clearly as does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this side of the House is responsible for legislation that originates here or that is passed by it, and I am not at all alarmed by the remarks of the gentleman with respect to that responsibility in this particular. The country knows full well that the magnificent results thus far achieved by the Secretary of the Interior have been secured by the employment of his regular force of inspectors and agents. But we have no evidence to show us that if this appropriation is withheld that that force of inspectors and agents will not be just as competent in the future to conduct these investigations as it has been to conduct the investigations in the past.

Here is a proposition to give the Secretary of the Interior $20,000, to be expended in the employment of the secret service force in connection with the Department of the Interior, to be used, not with reference to the land investigation alone, but without any limitation whatever. He can employ secret service men under this appropriation for any purpose he sees fit. If the appropriation is asked for in good faith and for the purpose of conducting this land-fraud investigation and is to be limited to that, then, Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the amendment: On page 122, line 4, after the word "cases," insert "to protect public land from unlawful and fraudulent entry or appropriation;" and in line 6 strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "twenty."

Mr. WILLIAMS. That sounds as if it limited the purposes for which the appropriation could be used.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does limit it to investigation of land frauds.

Mr. MANN. That is what they want.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It limits it to that purpose, and it seems to me it prevents the Secretary of the Interior from doing what he wants to do, to wit: To get private detectives, skilled experts, and not men upon the regular force or on the field force. Now, if there was no occasion for that language when you appropriate $10,000, what is the occasion for putting it in when you make an appropriation for $20,000?

Mr. MANN. It ought to have been in under the $10,000 item.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the limitation ought to have been put in. I will say to the gentleman that Congress has been very careful in the past in respect to making appropriations for the Secret Service. So careful has Congress been to prevent appropriations from being used for any other purpose——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know all about that.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). That in appropriating for the detection of counterfeiting, or alleged counterfeiting, Congress uniformly incorporates a provision that it shall not be used for any other purpose. Now, if you are going to increase the appropriations——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing to accept the substitute, but I want to understand it. Would that amendment prevent the Secretary of the Interior from using this fund as a secret-service fund?

Mr. TAWNEY. It would not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the gentleman thinks he would be able to use it for that purpose?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think he would be able to use it for that purpose, although I do not believe it was necessary for him to come to Congress and ask for the appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not regret it; a sleuth hound is dangerous to no honest man. Now and then a sleuth hound is necessary when you are pursuing thieves. If the gentleman assures me that his limitation on the amendment does not prevent the use of the $20,000 as a secret-service fund in hunting out evidence to show violations of these land laws, then I am willing to accept the substitute. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be reported once more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the substitute.

The Clerk again read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that is broad enough to cover it all, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my original amendment and accept the one offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will be withdrawn, and the question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert a new paragraph on page 122, after line 6, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the judges of the United States district courts, in those districts to which the public land laws apply, to charge the grand jury at each term of their courts to examine into the violations of the same and make true presentment of any person whom they shall find has violated any such laws."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment, or I will withhold it if the gentleman wishes to address the committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. If the committee will indulge me, I shall seriously address myself to the proposition. In the hearings before the Public Lands Committee, my colleague who sits at my right [Mr. BURNETT] will bear witness to the fact that a few days ago I offered a similar amendment in that committee—that is, that the district judges should instruct the grand juries to investigate the violations of the proposed law—and the committee adopted the proposition. A few weeks ago I offered on the floor of this House a like provision, and it was adopted in a bill applying to the District of Columbia. It was a very important measure. One of the objections to this proposition being put in the bill before the Public Lands Committee was that requiring the judge to instruct the grand jury in this particular matter whenever it met was entirely different from all the other land laws, and therefore it ought not to be adopted. I said the land laws should so provide. Mr. Chairman, the reason why I have offered this amendment is to get the public land laws of this country not only enforced, but to get them vigorously enforced, and for the further purpose that these public land frauds may at each session of the United States district court be brought sharply to the attention of the grand juries of the country, that the rights of the people and of the Government of the United States may be better protected. It was also given out before that Committee on Public Lands, Mr. Chairman, and it is notorious——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee believe it is within the power of Congress to enact a law to instruct or direct judges of the court respecting the discharge of their judicial functions? On the other hand, is it not an unwarranted interference on the part of Congress with respect to that which is essentially and necessarily judicial? It would be just as becoming, it seems to me, for the court in delivering an opinion to recommend legislation upon the part of Congress. Does the gentleman believe that any court would be bound to pay the least bit of respect to legislation of this character respecting the character of its instructions?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will answer the question, Mr. Chairman, that it is entirely in the power of Congress to pass such a law. We have such laws in the State of Tennessee, statute after statute, and so are a great many of the laws of the States of the United States, and I have heard judges obey such laws because the law so directed, and I think some of our Federal statutes now provide that the Federal judge must at each session of the grand jury instruct the grand jury on this or that particular thing. Otherwise it is within the discretion of the court, and the court may neglect or not want to act in the matter.

Unless Congress in creating a law says it shall be the duty of a judge to instruct the grand jury on the matter covered by the statute at each sitting of his grand jury it is entirely within his discretion.

Instead of interfering with the Executive, it seems to me that it is already the duty of the Executive, under the Constitution, to see that the laws are faithfully executed. That does not mean that the President shall go and instruct the grand jury himself or act himself on the offender. It means that he shall call the matter to the attention of the judges and to the district attorneys, and so on, and remove these attorneys if they fail to act. Now, we, the Congress, should say to the district judges in these land districts, "You charge your grand jury at each session of that great tribunal (that protects the morals of the people and brings the unrighteous before the bar of justice) to investigate this matter," and the court says, "Congress thinks it is of sufficient importance for me to instruct you so and so, and I do so instruct you." The court will not forget such a statute. The court must obey the law. Mr. Chairman, I confess I was shocked more than I ever was in my life about lawlessness—and I do not mean to speak unnecessarily discourteously or to reflect unnecessarily upon these land thieves [laughter] when I speak thus of them—I do not think I was ever more shocked in my life as to lawlessness than I have been at some of the developments at the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands.

I desire to say that it has come out before the Public Lands Committee that the law relative to land frauds "has never been enforced." I asked: "Do not your judges direct the grand juries to investigate these matters?" And the witnesses and members said: "Only within the last eighteen months." That is since the President got behind the judges, since the President got behind the district attorney, since the President said: "You go and charge your juries to investigate these land thieves." What has been the result? About 600 have been indicted, and I believe there are that many thousand guilty ones.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I hope that my friend from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] will withdraw his point of order. This will make a good law—a better law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] ought really, on his own statement, withdraw his amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why?

Mr. LITTAUER. Simply for the reason that matters of the great import to which he refers ought to be properly considered, and brought in here by a proper committee, and not put in as a rider on a legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That proposition is well written, I wrote it myself. [Laughter.] It is plain—easily understood.

Mr. LITTAUER. Unquestionably, but it is too broad for us to consider here. I am no lawyer——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is a good merchant and a good spokesman here for his bill, and I am a pretty good lawyer. I wrote that amendment. [Laughter.] I think it will make a good law, if you will give it a chance here and let us pass it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Surely the gentleman ought to withdraw it and not try to add such new legislation to this bill of the character that he describes when it has not even been considered by a committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has set me such a faithful example of obeying the rule——

Mr. LITTAUER. But we always examine our items in the committee room.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (continuing). That I feel I have a right to transgress once in a while, particularly to protect the great people of the West from the land thieves robbing them of their homesteads and their land rights under the law. I say this will make good law, and it should always have been part of the public land laws, and because it has not been thieves out West have been stealing the very top of the earth, if half the truth has been stated before our committee, and have gone below the surface for all that is in sight and out of sight.

You speak of the rule—a technical rule. Technicalities should be allowed to protect virtue only, and not vice, at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule of the House which is invoked against this amendment declares that there shall not be in order upon any appropriation bill any provision changing existing law. The proposed amendment manifestly defines and limits the duty, or at least the discretion, of judges of the United States courts to an extent to which they are not regulated, limited, or controlled by existing law. It is, therefore, a change of existing law. The point of order must be sustained.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the Committee on Rules will give me a rule on it and I will introduce it as a bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of messengers, stationery, printing and binding, books of reference for office use, and other incidental expenses, $350,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the items we have just passed appropriations are made in lump sums. Are the clerks employed and paid in the discretion of the surveyors-general or are they under the classified service?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are not annual clerks. They are clerks that come by seasons and a lump sum is appropriated, subject to the discretion of the surveyors-general.

Mr. JOHNSON. And is in the discretion of the head?

Mr. LITTAUER. Entirely so, and for the simple reason it can be expended during certain seasons of the year.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Office Postmaster-General: For compensation of the Postmaster-General $8,000; chief clerk, Post-Office Department, including $500 as superintendent of Post-Office Department building, $3,000; private secretary, $2,500; disbursing clerk, $2,250; bookkeeper and accountant, $2,000; two stenographers, at $1,600 each; appointment clerk, $2,000; one clerk, assistant to chief clerk, $2,000; one clerk of class 4; three clerks of class 3; six clerks of class 2; three clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; curator of museum, $1,000; three clerks, at $900 each; telephone switch-board operator; messenger in charge of mails, $900; one messenger; two assistant messengers; page, $360; engineer, $1,400; eight assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; electrician, $1,000; two assistant electricians, at $1,200 each; three dynamo tenders, at $900 each; one fireman, who shall be a blacksmith, and one fireman, who shall be a steam fitter, at $900 each; ten elevator conductors, at $720 each; fourteen firemen; carpenter, $1,200; assistant carpenter, $1,000; captain of the watch, $1,000; additional to two watchmen acting as lieutenants of watchmen, at $120 each; thirty-one watchmen; foreman of laborers, $800; thirty laborers; ten laborers and coal passers, at $500 each; plumber and awning maker, at $900 each; female laborer, $540; three female laborers, at $500 each; three female laborers, at $480 each; and thirty-two charwomen; in all, $147,650.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 130, in line 4, strike out "forty-seven" and insert "fifty-three."

Mr. LITTAUER. It is a mere correction of the total.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a series of amendments and would ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill may be changed in accordance with the recommendations of the Postmaster-General. There is no change of appropriation, but many changes in reference to nomenclature of divisions, etc. I send the amendments to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. What does it cover?

Mr. LITTAUER. It covers many sections under the Post-Office Department, if the gentleman will but listen.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Reserving the right to object, I will listen to the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 131, in line 9, strike out the word "general;" in line 10, after the word "superintendent," insert "division;" in line 11, after the word "superintendent," insert "division;" in lines 12 and 13 strike out "of the correspondence division" and insert "division of correspondence."

On page 132, in lines 6, 7, 16, 17, and 19, after the word "superintendent," insert the word "division;" in line 20, after the word "clerk," insert "division of foreign mails;" and before the word "division" strike out the word "of;" in line 21 strike out the words "of contract division" and insert "division of contracts;" in line 22, after the word "chief," insert "division," and after the word "equipment" strike out the word "division."

On page 133, in lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "postage-stamp supplies and postmasters' accounts" and insert "division of stamps;" in line 20 strike out the words "of system of postal finance" and insert "division of finance;" and in lines 23 and 24 strike out the words "of system of postal finance" and insert "division of finance."

On page 134, in line 1, strike out the words "of classification division" and insert "division of classification;" in line 2 strike out "classification division" and insert "division of classification;" in line 3 strike out "of redemption division" and insert "division of redemption;" in line 4 strike out "of registry system" and insert "division of registered mails;" in lines 5 and 6 strike out "of registry system" and insert "division of registered mails;" in lines 15 and 16 strike out "of registry system" and insert "division of registered mails;" and in lines 21 and 22 strike out "classification division" and insert "division of classification."

On page 135, in line 2, strike out the words "classification division" and insert "division of classification;" in line 20 strike out the words "rural free-delivery service" and insert "division of rural delivery;" and in line 21 strike out the words "supervisor of rural free-delivery service" and insert "assistant superintendent division of rural delivery."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendments proposed are changes in paragraphs not yet read. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill may be amended in the various particulars indicated.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to make a few remarks about that. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that these are matters that might well be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. We have a system of legislation going on here that when the Speaker abdicates the throne then this Committee on Appropriations does all the balance. I think it is a bad system. I think it leads to evil results——

Mr. LITTAUER. Is there legislation in these amendments?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And for that reason I shall insist that these matters should be considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, where they belong.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not think the gentleman wants that; it will merely change the phraseology; that is all.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is what the gentleman says—that it has no legislative purpose. If it has a legislative purpose, why not allow it to go to the committee to which it belongs?

Mr. LITTAUER. It has no legislative purpose.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In other words, the point I want to make is that if this House wants to legislate it ought to proceed here in a decent manner. Here a committee comes in with seven or eight hundred violations of the rules of the House. They have reported a bill that is absolutely in violation of the rules of the House, and we are called upon in this House to accept the situation that when the Speaker does not legislate himself, the balance of the legislation shall be perpetrated by this Committee on Appropriations. I shall object.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would say to the gentleman that there is no legislation in this.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, who made objection?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe the first amendment is in connection with the paragraph just finished. If that is the case, I would offer it as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am mistaken. The first amendment does not apply to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of post-office inspectors: Chief inspector, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000; three clerks of class 4; seven clerks of class 3; twelve clerks of class 2; fifteen clerks of class 1; fifteen clerks, at $1,000 each; thirteen clerks, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; one page, and two laborers; in all, $87,220.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to get some information.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the paragraph just read carries seventy-two employees, with aggregate salaries of $87,000. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York how many inspectors there are?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think that somewhere in the neighborhood of 500 of these inspectors are carried on the post-office and post-roads appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. My recollection is that there are about 150 rural delivery inspectors and about 150 post-office inspectors, and probably the post-office appropriation bill will provide for the consolidation of the two forces. But I do not think there will be over 300 people all told then.

Mr. TAWNEY. Four hundred and eighty now of rural free-delivery inspectors.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, supposing that the proposed legislation of the Post-Office Committee should fail, would there be any necessity for such a large force under the chief inspector of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is no increase in the force submitted in this bill over the force now at work in this inspector's office and doing the same work. We have not anticipated any legislation that may take place. This is exactly in accordance with the submission of the estimate by the Postmaster-General, and in the exact line of current law.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any increase in salaries?

Mr. LITTAUER. The chief inspector's salary is increased.

Mr. JOHNSON. What was the reason for increasing his salary?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say the reason for increasing the salary of the chief inspector was this: He has a force under him who are receiving more salary than he is receiving under existing law.

Mr. JOHNSON. And the only way to equalize is to go up.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, he has charge of the responsibility, the entire responsibility, of the force, and under this consolidation his responsibility will be greater than before.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that.

Mr. TAWNEY. And in order to equalize his compensation with the responsibilities of the office, why, the committee felt that it was due to the person who filled that position under this consolidation that he should receive that salary. He resides here in Washington, is located here in the Department, and receives no per diem allowance whatever. He gets nothing but straight salary, while the other inspectors have per diem and traveling expenses in addition to their salary.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office First Assistant Postmaster-General: For First Assistant Postmaster-General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; general superintendent of salaries and allowances, $4,000; assistant superintendent of salaries and allowances, $2,250; chief of the correspondence division, $2,000; five clerks of class 4; six clerks of class 3; ten clerks of class 2; seven clerks of class 1; four clerks, at $1,000 each; ten clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; one assistant messenger; three laborers; one page, $360; in all, $73,650.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 131, in line 9, strike out the word "general;" in line 10, after the word "superintendent," insert "division;" in line 11, after the word "superintendent" insert "division;" in lines 12 and 13, strike out "of the correspondence division" and insert "division of correspondence."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. With very great reluctance I rise to make a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That it changes existing law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, it is a mere matter of change of language and in no way changes existing law.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, if it adds nothing to the law as it now is and if it subtracts nothing from the law as it now stands, then it is a nullity. What is it done for? It is done to amend existing law, by whom? By this supreme committee that denies to every other committee and denies to every other Member the privilege which it claims.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman kindly refer me to the statute that this provision changes?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have not time to enlighten the gentleman. I want this bill to hurry along, so we can get to a vote on the statehood bill, and I have not time to stand here and enlighten the Members.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am glad the gentleman wants to hurry through the bill. I can assure him that there are others who are in the same frame of mind.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Let us drop these things that do not belong to this committee and get through with this bill, so that we can take up the question whether we will concur in the Senate amendments to the statehood bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. I suggest to the gentleman that we are trying to do properly our business here.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I submit that there is existing law fixing this salary already and that this provision changes it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to have his attention called to the existing law upon the subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this does not change existing law. It merely improves the English language that is used in the bill, and there is no rule of the House that prevents amendments improving the language in which a bill is framed; and the least the House has a right to do is to legislate in pure English. I believe that the committee is to be encouraged in its efforts to improve the language of the laws enacted by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] if there is a division of salaries now existing, having reference to lines 9 and 10? The Chair understands the proposed amendment to change the language; that it now reads "general superintendent of salaries" and that it is proposed to make it read "superintendent, division of salaries."

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks now if there is a division of salaries?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is certainly a division of salaries to-day, and the provision in the bill, authorized by appropriation law only, reads "general superintendent of salaries and allowance," and we seek to change that to "superintendent of division, salaries and allowances."

Mr. TAWNEY. If the Chair will permit me——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is to abolish one office and to create another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to find out what the existing law is.

Mr. TAWNEY. The proposition is merely to change the designation of the head of the division of salaries and allowances, and to make it more correctly designate the office which is filled by this man. It does not create any office; it does not change the duties of the man who is filling the office of chief of the salary and allowance division. It simply describes the office in more brief language than has heretofore been applied. That is the only purpose of it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman is to the effect that they propose by this amendment to change the statutory designation of an office heretofore created. They might just as well say that the Secretary of the Interior shall hereafter be called the Chief Sachem. What is the difference? You are changing absolutely the official designation which originally existed by statute to another designation.

Mr. LITTAUER. What statute, please?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The very one you have quoted.

Mr. LITTAUER. As carried in the appropriation bill; and, I believe that is not held here to be subject to the point of order. There is a division of salaries and allowances in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. How does that exist? By reason of law?

Mr. LITTAUER. By reason of appropriation law, not statutory law.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Appropriation law! That, as I understand it, is held to be above the laws of the country, in the estimation of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair is correctly advised, there is now under existing law a division of salaries and allowances, and there is a superintendent of that division. He is perhaps incorrectly described in the pending paragraph. The amendment is intended merely to more correctly describe him by the title by which he is known in the Post-Office Department and under the law as it now stands. It simply changes the phraseology of the bill without, as far as the Chair can see or has been shown, changing existing law in any particular. The point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of city delivery: Superintendent of city delivery, $3,000; assistant superintendent of city delivery, $2,000; three clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2; seven clerks of class 1; four clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger, and one laborer; in all, $28,300.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 132, lines 6 and 7, after the word "superintendent," in each line, insert the word "division;" so that it will read: "Superintendent of city delivery," in line 6, and "assistant superintendent of city delivery," in line 7.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Second Assistant Postmaster-General: For Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,500; superintendent of railway adjustments, $2,500; assistant superintendent of railway adjustments and law clerk, $2,250; superintendent of foreign mails, $2,000; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of inspection, $2,000; chief of contract division, $2,000; chief of mail equipment division, $2,000; eleven clerks of class 4; forty clerks of class 3; thirty-one clerks of class 2; stenographer, $1,600; twenty-four clerks of class 1; seventeen clerks, at $1,000 each; six clerks, at $900 each; messenger in charge of mails, $900; six assistant messengers; in all $207,970.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 132, lines 16, 17, and 19, after the word "superintendent," insert the word "division;" in line 20, after the word "clerk," insert "division of foreign mails;" before the word "division" strike out the word "of;" in line 21 strike out the words "of contract division" and insert the words "division of contracts;" in line 22, after the word "chief," insert the word "division;" and after the word "equipment" strike out the word "division."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments will be considered together.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Railway Mail Service: For the following now authorized and being paid from appropriations for the postal service, namely: General Superintendent, $4,000; Assistant General Superintendent, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,500; assistant chief clerk, $1,800; five clerks of class 3; six clerks of class 2; five clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; in all, $39,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill. The paragraph the Clerk has just read never appeared before in the legislative bill, did it?

Mr. LITTAUER. It never did.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman state the reason for putting it in the bill now?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is inserted here at this time by particular recommendation of the Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Did the gentleman and his committee put into the bill all of the recommendations of that Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. I can not say that we put them all in.

Mr. BURLESON. In matters of that kind we have.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is the only matter of this particular kind in the bill. We felt that the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, situated here in Washington, reporting daily to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, was properly within the sphere of this legislative bill, although the bill had never before carried it, and on the express recommendation of the Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General we were led to believe that this was the right place to carry it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is the gentleman familiar with the expenses that pertain to this particular office—the official expenses in regard to traveling when away from the Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. We understand that the officials we are providing for in this item are stationed in Washington.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is the gentleman familiar with the fact that there is a provision for expenses, and I will ask him whether or not he has provided for that expense account on this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. We have not. All the contingent expenses have to come out of the contingent fund of the Department.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 133, all of the language included in lines 5 to 14, inclusive, and upon that I wish to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, ever since the position of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service and the officials connected with that office were originally created, the items pertaining to their service have been carried on the appropriation bill controlled by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It is left for this Committee on Appropriations to reach out and take from another committee of the House items included in the provisions of their bill. This particular item would, in my judgment, be subject to a point of order, but for the protection of the rule, which in common with my colleagues I have helped to throw around the managers of this bill as a protection to the service. But if we are to permit the Committee on Appropriations to take over all of the items which it pleases them to assume control over, it will not be long before they have absorbed the jurisdiction of the other committees of this House, which, under the rules, have had given to them certain provisions for appropriation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] has stated that under the recommendation of the Second Assistant and the Postmaster-General they have inserted this provision here for the reason that these officials are a part of the Post-Office Department. It has not been left for the Appropriations Committee or for the Postmaster-General to determine whether or not these officials are a part of the Post-Office Department. That has been determined by the legal branch of the Government, and I cite the committee to a decision of an assistant attorney of the United States, which appeared in the report of 1905, on page 812, official opinion No. 922, rendered March 27, 1890. The syllabus of this opinion is in the following language:

> The position of General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service was created by departmental regulations. Such superintendent is not an officer of the Post-Office Department, and is not entitled to appoint minor officers. His function is merely to superintend the Railway Mail Service.

Under that decision it is clearly found, as I believe, that this same official could be located in the city of Washington or in San Francisco equally well and still properly discharge the duties of the service under his immediate jurisdiction. In this same opinion the Assistant Attorney-General stated, speaking of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service:

> He is not employed in the Post-Office Department proper. He holds no status as a bureau officer. He is not included in the organization of the Department.

At another part in the opinion he says:

> The practice has grown up of referring to and treating the office over which he presides as a bureau, or regarding it as a part of the inside workings of the Department, contrary, as I believe, to the original intent and to the spirit of subsequent enactments.

This particular official does nothing except superintend the Railway Mail Service, included within which are all of the railway-mail employees. The assistant superintendents of the general superintendent—some of them—have headquarters in the city of Washington at the Department. Why does this committee not include the assistant superintendents and not limit themselves to the general superintendents, because their duties are under him, and some of them retain their headquarters in the Department for months at a time and longer in many instances? I take it that this Committee of the Whole is not prepared to turn over to the Appropriations Committee the power to absorb from other committees of this House matters which from the period of their origin have been carried in other appropriation bills, and been carried properly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations does not desire to have any controversy over this action which the chairman of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads evidently regards as the equal of larceny. We find in the annual estimates, as submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, an estimate for this force. We find a statement in the annual report of the Postmaster-General wherein he states that he had made up his mind that there was conflict of authority and duplication of work by much of the organization of the Post-Office Department as it existed here in Washington, and he makes certain recommendations for the benefit of the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does he in those hearings state in any particular that there was any duplication of service so far as this particular branch of the service is concerned?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will come to what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have the gentleman cite me to the page to support that position.

Mr. LITTAUER. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who has had in charge the Railway Mail Service for many years, testified with reference to the legal decision to which the chairman of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], has just referred. I read from the hearings:

> Mr. TAWNEY. Under the decision of the Attorney-General, is he not a part of the Department?
> Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have no knowledge of any such decision.
> Mr. TAWNEY. Some years ago there was a decision that the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service was no part of the executive department of the Post-Office Department; the mere fact that he was housed here in Washington did not make him a departmental employee; that his duties pertained only and exclusively to the postal service and not to the Department.
> Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think that must be a decision which I can not now recall, but I should assume that it must be in the same sense that the chief post-office inspector could not be a departmental officer, as he is in charge of the entire field of inspectors.

The committee will bear in mind that the chief post-office inspector has already been provided for in this bill. Mr. Shallenberger continues:

> As a matter of fact he is a departmental officer and has been so recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman argue that because the chief post-office inspector is provided for in this bill, and that he has supervision of field work, therefore the Superintendent of Railway Mail Service and his office should be included? Also I would ask if there is not included in this bill the assistant superintendents of registry, who are exclusively occupied in field work, which should properly belong to the post-office supply bill, but which have never been appropriated for by the Post-Office Committee, as they have been provided for in the legislative bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. We do find that the legislative bill has for years provided for the chief post-office inspector and the superintendent of the rural delivery, because they are both stationed here in the city of Washington, although their work of supervision extends throughout the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. But they do not go out into the field as this general superintendent may, if occasion arises, and further provision is made for his expenses while in the field in the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am reliably informed that the General Superintendent does not go out in the field, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General states the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service has been located for years in the Department and assigned to a bureau of the Department, reporting daily through that bureau to the Postmaster-General, just as all the others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes further.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Indiana will yield just for a moment, I want to say one word in respect to this matter. When the Committee on Appropriations began the investigation of this reorganization of the Post-Office Department by the Postmaster-General there were no members of the committee who, I think, were in sympathy with the idea of providing for the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service in the legislative bill. The investigation was conducted along the line of trying to convince the heads of departments that we had no right to do it and that it would not necessarily result in benefit to the service, but after the fullest investigation and the testimony of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, as well as the Postmaster-General himself, the committee were unanimous that it would result in improving the efficiency of the service, lead to better administration, and, as they both testified before the committee, greater economy in the administration of that particular branch of the service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is it not a fact the Postmaster-General also recommends that the Appropriations Committee drop from its bill the assistant superintendent of registry, who was actually in the field?

Mr. TAWNEY. I think that is true.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And that your committee refused to do it?

Mr. TAWNEY. And I think the reason it was not done is due to the fact that the legislative bill has always heretofore carried this provision.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly so.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads would not, therefore, provide in their supply bill for this particular branch of the service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. May I ask another question? Is it not also true that the Postmaster-General recommended that you drop from the legislative bill the special agents of the classification division and you refused to do it?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not recall any recommendation of the Postmaster-General on that point.

Mr. OVERSTREET. You seem to remember very particularly, however, this one recommendation.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do, because I was opposed originally to including it in this bill. The Committee on Appropriations has no pride of opinion in regard to this matter at all. We acted upon the recommendation of the Department when convinced, as we all were, that it would improve the service to do so.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. TAWNEY. In just one minute, if the gentleman from New Jersey will pardon me. The argument made by the Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in favor of doing this overcame the objections of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, and we inserted it with a view of submitting it to the House, with the testimony of the two men, as to whether or not it would lead to better administration and greater economy in the carrying on of the work of the Department than if this Bureau continued outside of the Department, as heretofore. There were reasons given by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General which, I think, if the gentlemen had the time to read the testimony, would lead them to the same conclusion to which we were led, although we were not originally in favor of the proposition, and it is not a matter of any consequence to the Committee on Appropriations whether it stays in or goes out. It is only a question as to whether or not this Bureau, which is located here in the Department and which reports to the Postmaster-General every day or to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General every day, should be treated separately and distinct from the departmental service and as a part of the field service in regard to the postal service of the country. That is the only question. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I wish, while the gentleman is on that feature, it could be stated how the efficiency and economy of an officer of the Department, as you claim, could be affected by the question of what bill he gets his pay from.

Mr. TAWNEY. I asked that same question. I asked the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I can not refer to his testimony now, but I think the gentleman from New York has it, and he can answer the question; but my recollection is the Second Assistant Postmaster-General so stated.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to call the attention of the committee, with the permission of the gentleman, to the statement, in the hearings, of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, in charge of this service. After describing its establishment, and after referring to the railway mail establishment, he continues in these words:

> At a later date the rural delivery was established in much the same way, and the clerical force of the superintendent having charge of the entire field service were on the postal-service bill. Later on the rural-delivery clerical force at headquarters was recognized on the legislative bill by act of Congress. Now, to make the organization complete and systematic, the Postmaster-General has felt, and is quite in earnest in that belief, that the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, being the last remaining supervising official acting in the Department proper, should be recognized on the pending legislative appropriation bill. He has felt that it would be consistent with the organization already in fact secured.

Now, that was the reason we acted, and we acted in absolutely good faith, without any design of taking advantage of the Post-Office Committee or of any other committee.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly the Committee on Appropriations have now opened their amendment to the point that it is new legislation. The Chairman says that somehow or other there is to be an economy and an efficiency to result from changing the authority for the pay of an official from one bill to another. Now, it goes without saying that that could not result without that change carried with it a difference of status, a difference of authority, and some new power. Now, the gentleman from New York rises and reads from the hearings, in which an officer of the Department attempts to show that the essential thing is that this officer, the Superintendent, be recognized by an act of Congress in the appropriation bill as a departmental official. That means, in brief, a statement that the purpose here is to overcome a ruling of the Attorney-General that this official is not a departmental officer, by having him recognized as such in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and that by authority of this legislation he is hereafter to be recognized as a departmental officer and to have a status and to have a power that he does not now possess. So that by the argument of the chairman, by so much of the hearings as is read by the gentleman from New York, they would establish the fact that the purpose is not only to take this official out of the post-office appropriation bill, but to change his status, thus making this a piece of far-reaching legislation which will make the officer a departmental official.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I have been listening to this debate with a view of getting some information about the question in controversy, and my feeling has been if it was simply a conflict between the fat-bellied Committee on Appropriations and the lean and hungry Committee on the Post-Office, my sympathies would seem to me to be with the Committee on the Post-Office. But the gentleman from New Jersey has undertaken to inform the committee that it affects a question of administration. If it does, of course it is important for the Committee of the Whole to know it. I would like to know to what extent the power of this officer would be increased by having the salary and expense carried in the legislative bill over and above what would belong to it if it were provided for through the post-office bill? I do not understand where the increase of power and dignity comes from.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is the very thing, Mr. Chairman, which I have been trying to make clear to the understanding of the gentleman from Indiana, and to impress upon the other members of the committee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman has simply made an assertion, without giving us the theory or the facts supporting his position. I am not willing, notwithstanding I have great confidence in the judgment and truthfulness of the gentleman from New Jersey, to take his statement. I think we ought to have something more than a blank assertion of fact.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Now, there has been no blank assertion. I fear the gentleman was not listening to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, who read a decision of the Attorney-General that this is not a departmental official. That opinion is conclusive. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations tells us this recognition in this bill is going to work economy and efficiency. That means he is going to have a different status or it could not occur. A case arose that was decided out of his attempt to appoint a subordinate, which the Attorney-General held that he could not do, because he was not a departmental officer. Everything read by the gentleman from New York about the importance of having him legislatively recognized as a departmental official was proof that he would have a different status. The purpose of recognition in this bill is to give a new and different status to the official to whom it applies. If the gentleman from Indiana has not understood that, it is not my fault.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from New Jersey permit an inquiry?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, I want to consider this matter fairly and candidly, without any feeling of interfering with any other committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman from New Jersey——

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from New Jersey will be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether, in his judgment, he thinks we are better qualified to determine what is for the best interests, in the matter of the details of the service, than the heads of the Departments, who are charged with the responsibility of administering the service? And if the heads of the Departments ask that this particular branch of the service be brought into the departmental service, in the interest of better administration, whether we are not justified in following their recommendations? And if we do it, what harm then can come to anybody? It matters not to the Committee on Appropriations, and I take it that it does not matter to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which committee reports in favor of this proposition.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. Does this change enlarge the powers or increase the duties and responsibilities of this official?

Mr. LITTAUER. In no way.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it limits the powers of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service in this. There is no other officer in the Post-Office Department who can detail clerks from any branch in the service. The Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service can detail any number of clerks, from any branch of the Department, into the Railway Mail Service. He may detail any number that he may see fit, for the reason that the law prohibiting the detailing of employees from one Department to another is not applicable to the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, as he has not heretofore been held to be a departmental officer; and that is one of the instances, as I now recall it, given by Mr. Shallenberger, where the service and the efficiency of it would be very greatly improved.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question asked by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, as to who was best qualified to determine these things, of course, that is simply the old, old question, and carried to its logical conclusion it means that Congress ought not to determine anything, but leave the whole service to the discretion of the several Departments.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not admit that, if the gentleman will pardon me. I submit, however, that in view of their recommendations the question ought to be considered on its merits, without reference to the jurisdiction of either committee.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Well, we are trying to consider it on its merits. Now, if it were not for the reservation in the rule the appropriation for every part of the Post-Office service, from the Postmaster-General to the carrier in Alaska, would have gone to the Post-Office Committee; but the rule reserved to the Appropriations Committee the executive, legislative, and judicial bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. One moment. Now, the question is, What ought to be in the bill? There was no absolute authority anywhere for drawing that line, but it was drawn between the things that appertained to the Department as created by statute and to the service. The question here is, To which bill does this officer belong? The Attorney-General holds that he does not belong to the Department. That is the law. If this bill operates to transfer him, then it is new legislation, originated in the Committee on Appropriations. Now, the gentleman asks, "What is the importance of it?" You may say there is none or you may say there is much. I do not care what answer you give, but that raises the question. For what are the rules created? If we are going to ride down the rule in this case, let us ride it down in every case where, in the judgment of gentlemen, it would work better if changed. I think I know how the members of the Post-Office Committee feel about this, and what they want to do is to enforce the rule—to allow this committee to appropriate for everything that belongs to it, and to leave to the Post-Office Committee the things which belong to it. The unvarying course of authorities from the desk is that the Departmental service belongs to these gentlemen and that the other part of the service belongs to the Post-Office Committee, and the Attorney-General holds that this official is not a departmental officer. That is the whole case.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that debate on this paragraph and amendments close in five minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I should like a little time.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then I make it ten minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. According to the rule, is not debate on this amendment exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. Construing the rule strictly, it permits, upon an amendment, one argument in favor of it and one argument against it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Have not those arguments been made already?

The CHAIRMAN. They have.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I make the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order that that is not germane to this amendment, and that there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is in order to move to amend the amendment. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, if I can get the attention of the committee for a moment, I want to suggest that this is not a question between the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. We have no right to make that a question. The question before every man in this House is, What is best for the administration of the Department? As the gentleman in charge of the bill stated, we were utterly opposed to inserting this matter in this bill for the very reason that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] just stated—that it was not in line with our former conduct as to the legislative bill. The Postmaster-General himself and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who is specifically in charge of this Railway Mail Service, convinced us that they could administer the Post-Office Department, not only with more ease and facility, but with less expense and with fewer irregularities, if we would consent to take the statement and follow the recommendation of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Now, then, it is not for the Appropriations Committee to determine what is best in the line of administration for that Department or any other. Neither is it justifiable on the part of any man on this floor to come into this House and say that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is the better committee to judge of it. The Department, through its official head, ought to determine this matter, and it did determine and convince the Committee on Appropriations that we ought to make the change. What are you going to do—take the quibblings and the reasons given on that side from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, or the reasons given on this side by the Appropriations Committee? No. Take the reasons given by the Department itself and settle this question and you have done your duty.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman will agree with me in saying that they sought us to do this and that we were convinced against our inclination.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman states the exact fact.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I want to know how they convinced this committee that it would save so much to the Government by getting this through the legislative bill rather than through the Post-Office bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. By absolutely producing the facts to the committee like any other testimony is presented to the human mind and human judgment. That is the way it was done.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow me, I would like to read the answers to the questions put by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. I read from the hearings:

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You began to give some reasons why the general superintendent should be put under the Department's control, and you mentioned the detailing or transferring of clerks from the field into the office, independent of the civil service and independent of your wishes or the wishes of the Postmaster-General. Is not that really the touchstone with him as to his objection? You stated a moment ago that the general superintendent was not in sympathy with this recommendation?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And in answer to Mr. TAWNEY you stated one specific case and I supposed you would give others. The one illustration you gave him was that a man simply running on the line from Greenville to Atlanta could be transferred into the office here and that the civil service or nobody else could interfere with that; that he has absolute control and changes his clerical force in the building here under his immediate supervision as he desires. If he goes under the Department's control, as recommended by the Postmaster-General, that man would have to be transferred through the civil service?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTAUER. And that that was one abuse which this proposition might prevent?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I did not say it was an "abuse."

Mr. LITTAUER. Not an abuse, but a privilege which would be wiped out.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is there any other reason why that ought to be done?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There are several reasons. It would unify and systematize the methods prevailing in the Department with reference to the payment of employees. All our clerks are paid by the disbursing officer of the Department, for instance, on rolls which the Postmaster-General approves. Those rolls provide for so many clerks of this class and so many clerks of that class, and those clerks are responsive to the Postmaster-General in any one of the various bureaus or divisions of the Department, but when it comes to this particular class of clerks who are continuously employed in the office of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service they are not included within that class, they are not on the roll paid by the disbursing clerk.

It is simply to bring the clerks employed here in the Department under the absolute control of the heads of the Department under the rules and regulations that govern and control the Department. It is upon that basis the head of the Department requested the Committee on Appropriations to take this action.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I commend to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] that testimony. Any man who will take five minutes to go over it will be convinced, if he is an intelligent man, that the Committee on Appropriations did the right thing, notwithstanding in the early investigation we were utterly opposed to it. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are quite willing that this question should be decided, not on jurisdictional grounds, but on its merits.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is where it should go.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question before the committee is not whether we should follow the recommendation of the Post-Office officials, but which committee of this House is better able to supervise their recommendations as to matters pertaining to the postal service. Can it be claimed by anyone, even by the distinguished gentlemen that constitute the Committee on Appropriations, that they are better versed in matters on post-office affairs, and therefore better able to pass intelligently on the needs of the service, than the committee whose sole province is postal matters? The inevitable conflict when the Appropriations Committee provides for service that belongs to the Post-Office Committee is evidenced in items in this very bill which have already been cared for in the post-office supply bill. And yet this condition must continue to confront the different committees if one committee is given the right to assume jurisdiction that belongs to another committee.

Mr. LITTAUER. Which bill was reported first?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not a question which bill was reported first. It is a question which committee had the hearings first and which committee has heretofore provided for that service.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will for a short question, because my time is limited.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If we had not adopted the general 13-inch-gun rule under which we are operating the gentleman could have put this out of this bill on a point of order, could he not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Clearly so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will ask the gentleman if he voted for the rule?

Mr. STAFFORD. I voted for the rule, because I thought there were sufficient merits in the proposition to convince a majority of the membership of this House that it belonged to the Post-Office Committee rather than to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman put out of his own hands the ability to protect his own committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. We still have it in our hands and are going to leave it to a majority of this House, which is ample authority for us to stand on.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman concede the right of the Postmaster-General to suggest a consolidation of the positions in his Department so that they could be brought under his immediate jurisdiction for the purpose of giving a better management of the Department than he was able to give under the method that was pursued prior to the consolidation of this position into the executive branch of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there has been no showing made before the Committee on Appropriations that any added efficiency or any saving would result; in fact it has been shown that these very officials who are sought to be transferred, instead of getting a fifteen-day leave of absence, as provided for employees carried in the appropriation bill, will get a sixty-day leave of absence if they are transferred to the legislative bill. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] lays great stress on economy, and yet they appropriate for every one now employed in the service at the same salaries.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not use the word "economy" in my speech at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] did, and I will transfer that statement to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, under the rule relative to jurisdiction of committees, it is provided that subjects relating to the Post-Office and Post-Roads, including appropriations for their support, shall be considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The general superintendent of the mails deals exclusively with the superintendence of the post-roads, and, under that rule, which I have just read, his particular duties would fall under the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish particularly to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole House to this situation. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the gentleman in charge of this particular bill have laid much stress upon the recommendation of the Postmaster-General for the transfer of this particular item to the legislative bill; but, sir, the same recommendation which went to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations contained the further recommendation that the assistant superintendents of the registry division and of the classification division be dropped from the legislative bill and transferred to the bill controlled by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The gentlemen, as guardians of the appropriations of this House, think that it is entirely proper for them to assume the jurisdiction where it has been recommended, but they spurn the idea of releasing jurisdiction from their own committee, even though the same letter contained both recommendations.

This very item, in the very identical language as presented in this bill, which I seek to strike out upon proper motion, is contained in the bill providing appropriations for the postal service. I have not pursued the same practice which these gentlemen have, of undertaking to absorb these other provisions although the Postmaster-General has made the recommendation, because I think that kind of arrangement ought to be effected between the two committees without contest upon the floor. I offered this committee to make that exchange, if we might do it in a proper way, but it refused, and now they insist on retaining in this bill absolute jurisdiction not only of these items recommended by the Postmaster-General to be transferred from the legislative bill into the Post-Office appropriation bill, but also to absorb two items which I shall later call to the attention of the committee and put them in their bill as well.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the point is simply this: Is the Committee of the Whole, now representing the House, to permit by its vote the Appropriations Committee to assume this particular item, and others which will follow, or are we to pursue the ordinary methods of permitting some of the committees of this House to retain a part of the labor which has been imposed upon them by the rules of the House?

I hope, Mr. Chairman, the committee will strike from the bill the language which I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LITTAUER) there were—ayes 58, noes 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had instructed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14808. An act authorizing the Choctawhatchee Power Company to erect a dam in Dale County, Ala.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 20.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a survey and examination of the Passaic River, New Jersey, beginning at the Montclair and Greenwood Lake Railroad bridge to the present head of navigation at the city of Passaic, with a view to providing suitable navigation facilities for the needs of the city of Passaic—

To the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 11467. An act for the relief of Maj. George E. Pickett, paymaster, United States Army;

H. R. 125. An act regulating the retent on contracts with the District of Columbia;

H. R. 4463. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;"

H. R. 4470. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895;

H. R. 14813. An act to amend an act approved March 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' approved February 28, 1901;" and

H. R. 15842. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Eastern Star Home for the District of Columbia," approved March 10, 1902.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. STERLING was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Jeremiah E. Waldon, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. ADAMS was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Charles H. Frank, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, in order that the consideration of the pending appropriation bill may be concluded, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Saturday for to-morrow for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on War Claims.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON ELECTION OF PRESIDENT, VICE-PRESIDENT AND REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by said committee during the Fifty-ninth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of H. R. 17453, which I am told is exhausted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the denaturized-alcohol bill?

Mr. PAYNE. It is the free-alcohol bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service submitting an estimate of appropriation for purchase of quarantine station at Portland, Me.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Sunflower River, Mississippi—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting an answer to the inquiry of the House as to the status of the Indiahoma Union Signal, relative to admission to the mails—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and letter only ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 980) to ratify an agreement with the Lower Brule band of the Sioux tribe of Indians in South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2737); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NEVIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 20) to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee; in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2739); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. COLE, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12872) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and codify the laws relating to municipal corporations in the district of Alaska," approved April 28, 1904, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2741); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14015) to establish a fund for public works in the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2743); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LACEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15335) for the protection of game animals, birds, and fishes in the Olympic Forest Reserve of the United States, in the State of Washington, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2744); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. DRAPER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2796) granting a pension to Benjamin T. Oglorne, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2682); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LONGWORTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3333) granting a pension to William Simmons, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2683); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. AMES, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4264) granting a pension to Frances E. Maloon, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2684); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 30, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5381. An act to amend rule 12 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to lights on water craft;

S. 5027. An act providing for the establishment of life-saving stations and for the construction of a telephone line on the coast of Washington between Cape Flattery and Grays Harbor in aid of the preservation of life and property;

S. 5359. An act to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army;

S. 5386. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," approved February 8, 1895; and

S. 5285. An act to amend "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," approved June 7, 1897.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5381. An act to amend rule 12 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to lights on water craft—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5027. An act providing for the establishment of life-saving stations and for the construction of a telephone line on the coast of Washington between Cape Flattery and Grays Harbor, in aid of the preservation of life and property—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5359. An act to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 5386. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," approved February 8, 1895—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 5285. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States," approved June 7, 1897—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

While the House was dividing the following occurred:

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no"——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BEDE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. There were no ayes, and I voted "no." I just wanted to call up a bill from the Speaker's table if I had time before the House went into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Well, a little later.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Third Assistant Postmaster-General: For Third Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,500; superintendent postage stamp supplies and postmasters' accounts, $2,750; superintendent of system of postal finance, who shall give bond in such amount as the Postmaster-General may determine for the faithful discharge of his duties, $2,250; assistant superintendent of system of postal finance, $2,000; superintendent of classification division, $2,750; 4 special agents, classification division, at $2,000 each; chief of redemption division, $2,000; superintendent of registry sytem, $2,500; 6 assistant superintendents of registry system, at $2,000 each; 8 clerks of class 4; 21 clerks of class 3; 25 clerks of class 2; 42 clerks of class 1; 45 clerks, at $1,000 each; 7 clerks, at $900 each; 5 clerks, at $840 each; 1 clerk, $720; 1 messenger; 5 assistant messengers; 12 laborers; in all, $226,230.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 133, in lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "postage stamp supplies and postmasters' accounts" and insert "division of stamps;" in line 20 strike out the words "of system of postal finance" and insert "division of finance;" and in lines 23 and 24 strike out the words "of system of postal finance" and insert "division of finance."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, these several amendments will be considered together. The question is on agreeing to them.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LITTAUER. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 134, in line 1, strike out the words "of classification division" and insert "division of classification;" in line 2 strike out "classification division" and insert "division of classification;" in line 3 strike out "of redemption division" and insert "division of redemption;" in line 4 strike out "of registry system" and insert "division of registered mails;" in lines 5 and 6 strike out "of registry system" and insert "division of registered mails;" in lines 15 and 16 strike out "of registry system" and insert "division of registered mails;" and in lines 21 and 22 strike out "classification division" and insert "division of classification."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments will be considered together.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman from New York about this item. I wish to ask if the words "assistant superintendent of system of postal finance," in lines 23 and 24, on page 133, is a change of the phraseology or if it is a new position?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is not.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is now carried?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is now carried and is nothing new.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask at this point if the Postmaster-General has recommended the transfer from this legislative bill to the Post-Office appropriation bill of the provision for the special agents of the classification division and the assistant superintendent of the registry system, appearing on page 134?

Mr. LITTAUER. After the bill was reported to the House we had such a recommendation from the Postmaster-General, but that recommendation also included the recommendation which the gentleman from Indiana had stricken out of the bill last evening. All the reason he gave, or at least the only one I could comprehend, was that the provision which the Postmaster-General recommended should be inserted in this bill, and in accordance was inserted in the bill by the committee, was simply because it has always been carried in the service bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is the only reason I could appreciate for your action.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I want to show him, and have the gentleman admit in committee, that on this particular item, on page 134, which he retains on the legislative bill, the same recommendation for transfer was made—to transfer the other item in this bill, and the gentleman gave consent to strike this out because they have been carried in this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. My opinion and belief is that they ought to go in, and those you put out ought to go in.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think so.

Mr. LITTAUER. And they would have been had your action been otherwise, and I know that would have been proper.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I believe so, and for that reason made the suggestion to the gentleman prior to yesterday, and he declined to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the following employees now employed in the postage-stamp agency and appropriated for in the postal service appropriation: One clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; four clerks, at $900 each, and two clerks, at $840; in all, $7,440.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out on page 135 the language contained in lines 3 to 8, both lines inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 135, lines 3 to 8, both lines inclusive.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this is the provision for what is known as the "stamp agency" of the service. Under the law the manufacture of stamps is under contract, and just now that contract happens to be with the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. It does not necessarily fall with that Bureau. The stamp agency is the check between the manufacturer and the Government, and this agency should be, and always is, located in the same place where the manufacture of stamps is carried on under the contract. If you transfer from the service bill providing for the general appropriation for the postal service these particular employees, and the next contract for manufacture, which falls next November, should go outside of the city of Washington, it would be necessary to create an entirely new corps of clerks in that agency to be located at the place of manufacture. This item has always been carried in the bill providing for the general postal service. It should be carried there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I trust the members of the committee, as well as the members of the Committee of the Whole, will appreciate that there is nothing personal in my desire to strike this item out of this bill. I do not doubt but what the service would be equally well performed. But the orderly arrangement has been in the past for the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, having jurisdiction of what is known as the "service appropriations," to care for items of this character. It is true that the Postmaster-General has recommended a transfer of these items to the legislative bill; but, Mr. Chairman, that recommendation is upon the theory that the manufacture of stamps will continue to be performed by the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, which is located in the city of Washington.

Mr. LITTAUER. Would you continue these clerks, even though they have no work now to perform, where appropriated for, and are detailed to other work?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, they are performing this work as a check between the manufacturer and the service, and it is my judgment, Mr. Chairman, that the next contract for the manufacture of stamps will not be held by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Now, we have provided in the Post-Office appropriation bill, which is now on the Calendar, and has been for some time, for these very identical employees, as they have heretofore been provided, and in the item appropriating for the expense of the manufacture of stamps we have carried the provision that hereafter that contract shall not be held by any bureau of the Government unless it shall be the lowest bidder. I believe this House will sustain the committee in its recommendation against the continuance of this contract by a Government bureau at a greater expense than private enterprise can perform equally good service. Now, I wish to emphasize the position which I occupy in seeking to strike this provision from this bill. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has had full hearings upon these matters. It has considered this identical item in the bills in past years. It carries this identical item in the bill which it has already reported to this House, and I think that the Committee on Appropriations is having sufficient labor in its own field without turning over to it this additional item. I trust the committee will sustain the motion to strike this language from the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the committee will not be influenced by the argument of the gentleman from Indiana to the effect that the Committee on Appropriations is seeking for more work to do or that it is attempting to infringe upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Neither purpose actuated the Committee on Appropriations in inserting this provision in this bill. Members of this House are aware of the fact that the Postmaster-General has for many months been endeavoring to reorganize the postal service, especially the departmental service. In the reorganization that he has effected, and which will result in the conduct of that Department at a much less expense than has heretofore been required, he has seen fit to drop the stamp agency heretofore carried and provided for in the postal-service bill. That is the reason why that provision is carried here, providing for these clerks. There is in this bill an appropriation for these clerks in another department, which is exclusively within departmental jurisdiction.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the contract for the making of stamps is left to an outside——

Mr. TAWNEY. I know what the gentleman's question is going to be, and if he will wait a moment——

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman yielded for a question. I was going to put a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I know, but it is a question which does not relate to the point that I am discussing at this time. The Postmaster-General, I say, dropped the Washington stamp agency. That stamp agency was carried in the postal-service bill, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] states. It had in connection with it a number of clerks, and these clerks will be transferred by this provision into another department of the Post-Office Department which belongs exclusively to that department and is always provided for in the legislative appropriation bill. Now, if you drop the stamp agency entirely, it being in the judgment of the Postmaster-General unnecessary to the postal service, then there is nothing to be carried in the service bill in relation to the stamp agency. If you propose to continue the stamp agency with the force of clerks that is now employed here in Washington in connection with that agency, which I say the Postmaster-General recommends the discontinuance of, then I submit that the proper place to provide for those clerks who will be retained in the stamp agency is in the service bill. It is not therefore a question of jurisdiction, between the committees at all. There is not any desire on the part of the Appropriations Committee to take into this bill anything that belongs to the service bill; but this belongs here because, in the judgment of the Postmaster-General and in the judgment of the committee upon the testimony which he presented to the committee, this stamp agency here in Washington is useless and unnecessary, and it is proposed to abolish the office of agent entirely and take these clerks in the agency into the department of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and this provision makes appropriation for their compensation, and that is all there is in the proposition. It is one of the features incident to the reorganization of the Post-Office Department, which reorganization was instituted some months ago and has been completed by the Postmaster-General in the interest of better administration and greater economy in the public service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How much, if any, expense is saved by this arrangement?

Mr. TAWNEY. We abolish, under this system, the office of agent entirely; and that salary, which is not less than $2,000, is saved.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. You save the salary of that officer?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and then in addition to that the clerks that are taken out of that division and transferred to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's office will give him a force that we otherwise would have to provide for.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. What becomes of the agent?

Mr. TAWNEY. The office is abolished after the 1st of July, and I do not know what will become of it then.

Mr. OVERSTREET. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Suppose the next contract for the manufacture of stamps, which must be made, under the law, next fall, should go to a contractor in New York or Chicago, would it not be necessary to have a corps of these agents?

Mr. TAWNEY. If it is necessary under that condition to continue the stamp agency or to provide for a stamp agency again it can be done. The gentleman is proceeding upon a supposition that certain things may happen in the future. The reorganization is made upon existing conditions, and if the Congress of the United States should take such action as to prevent the Bureau of Printing and Engraving supplying the Government with these stamps, and the agency then became necessary, it would be entirely competent for Congress to provide for such agency. But we are not legislating upon suppositions, we are not legislating upon what may or may not happen, we are providing for the service of the Government as it now exist under this reorganization and as it has been completed by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. One further question. The gentleman understands that the contract for the manufacture of stamps expires the 31st of next October. You are legislating for the fiscal year of 1907 and not for the present fiscal year.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the contract for the manufacture of stamps should go to a contractor away from Washington the 1st of next November, that would be for the last of the fiscal year of 1907. It is to that point that I make the inquiry of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, let us suppose that the contract does not go away, then you have provided for an unnecessary service here in the city of Washington.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not unnecessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is unnecessary under the present reorganization, and therefore the probability of this contract going or not going should not control the action of this committee at this time, because if it does not go away, then we have provided for an unnecessary service during the next fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman allow me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has said in reply to an inquiry that there would be a saving of $2,000 by discontinuing the employment of the chief clerk. Are you not providing in this bill, by a change of designation, for the same work to be performed in the Department by some official, under the name of assistant superintendent of the finance division, which has never before been carried in the legislative bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. The financial postal system has been carried in previous postal bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. The assistant superintendent of the finance division? Your hearings, at the bottom of page 528, disclose the contrary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. This new office is created for the purpose of doing the work that was performed before by the chief clerk of the stamp agency. I will read from the hearings, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. TAWNEY. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD (reading)—

> Under the act, the date of which I do not recall, to relieve that situation the stamp agent was designated to act as assistant superintendent of the finance division, and such part of his time as is not necessary to be employed at his agency is employed now in the stamp division signing warrants; and it takes from one to five hours a day to do that.

Now, here you are providing——

Mr. TAWNEY. Go on and read the balance.

Mr. STAFFORD (reading)—

> Through the elimination of that agent we need some one to take the place and perform that service, and it is very necessary. It is the desire to have the position formerly known as "chief of the files and mails division" designated now as "assistant superintendent of the finance division" at the same salary—there is no change of salary—to perform this service.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman has answered his own question by reading from the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have shown that the assistant superintendent of the finance division is to perform the same work that was performed by the other officer; that the work of the stamp agent will be performed by the man who has performed some work in the files and mails division, under the designation of "assistant superintendent of the finance division," at the same salary.

This hearing shows that from one to five hours daily is occupied by the chief clerk of the stamp agency in signing these warrants, and the rest of his time is occupied in the stamp-agency work proper; and here is some other official giving some attention to the files whose continuance is a doubtful question. We are going to transfer this work which was formerly done by the clerk of the stamp agency merely to another official under a new designation.

Mr. TAWNEY. That illustrates the manner in which the reorganization of the Post-Office Department is going to effect economies which the Postmaster-General shows that it will accomplish by consolidating these two positions—the position of stamp agent and the position of chief of the division of files and mails. If this provision remains in the bill, one man will do the work which both of these men have heretofore performed, which will save at least one salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it questioned at all by the gentleman that there will be need for a stamp agency to do this work of supervision if the contract is let to a private party outside of the city of Washington?

Mr. TAWNEY. I don't know whether it will be necessary or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General has stated in the hearings before the Post-Office Committee that it would be necessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do know this, that in that event it will be necessary for the Government of the United States to have some supervision over the matter of the manufacture of stamps—the counting of them, checking of them—at the place where this work is done; but there is no necessity for this stamp agency in that event here in the city of Washington; and, as I said before, we have no evidence before us that an outside contractor is going to get this contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. But, if the gentleman will permit me, in the interim between the letting of this contract in October, 1906, and the assembling of Congress in the following December, what provision can be made by a delegation of clerks from the Department to a stamp agency that would be required for the protection of the Government, to supervise this very necessary and essential work, if this contract should be let to a contractor outside of Washington? Congress will not then be in session.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the Postmaster-General, if that service is needed outside of the city, whether the stamp agency exists or not, it will be entirely competent for him to provide for the service. He can detail men in the employ of the Government for that service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I beg to question the statement of the gentleman that the Postmaster-General has any authority whatsoever under existing law to detail clerks connected with the departmental service and provided for in the departmental bill for work in the postal service proper as distinguished from departmental work.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, the gentleman knows that the Postmaster-General is detailing men frequently, constantly, almost daily, out of his Department to service in some other branch of the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not in detailing departmental clerks, and the law expressly forbids him to detail departmental clerks to work known as the "field service," which is provided for in the Post-Office supply bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the feeling manifested by the members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in this matter is not going to warp the judgment of Members of this House upon a question which pertains to the reorganization of the departmental service here in the city of Washington, which is calculated to and will have the effect of producing better administration and greater economy in the service of that Department. From the standpoint of committee jurisdiction, it matters not to the Committee on Appropriations a bawbee whether this remains in this bill or is carried in the service appropriation bill; but if we are to carry out these reforms that have been inaugurated by the head of this Department, if we are to improve the service and secure greater efficiency and greater economy in that service, then I trust that Members of the House will rise above the petty question of whether it should be in this appropriation bill or in that appropriation bill and determine the question according to their own best judgment as to what the service requires. Now, let me read from the testimony of the chief clerk of the Post-Office Department, Mr. Chance:

> Mr. LITTAUER. In the regular service bill, under the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, there appears "Pay of agent and assistants to distribute stamps," "Pay of agent and assistants to distribute stamped envelopes," and "Pay of agent and assistants to distribute postal cards." Those three provisions were submitted last year. If this additional force is taken into the legislative bill and covered into the civil service it would take care of some extra men, temporarily employed, which you now seek to eliminate from the service force?
> Mr. CHANCE. The entire stamp agency is located here in Washington. There is just one stamp agent here in Washington.
> Mr. LITTAUER. That stamp agent was carried in the service appropriation bill?
> Mr. CHANCE. Yes, sir; he is now. We want to transfer that force just as it stands, with the exception of the agent, and the chief of the stamp division will supervise the work.
> Mr. LITTAUER. What becomes of the agent?
> Mr. CHANCE. He is dropped out.
> Mr. TAWNEY. Is he now in the classified service?
> Mr. CHANCE. I do not know whether he is or not.
> Mr. LITTAUER. What will become of the clerks provided for last year?
> Mr. CHANCE. They are in the stamp division.
> Mr. LITTAUER. They will be promoted?
> Mr. CHANCE. This is a different crowd altogether—the agency itself. The others were people employed in the Department proper, but paid from the other roll.

"They were employed in the Department proper, but paid from the other roll," and what he means by that is that they paid from the service roll, from the service appropriation, service outside of the city of Washington.

Mr. LITTAUER. What becomes of the force provided for there?

Mr. CHANCE. They are provided for in this appropriation, and it will be found in the same shape.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then in addition to the force provided for on page 8 of this bill this force provided for in the post-office appropriation bill to be added to the departmental service?

Mr. CHANCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTAUER. That is in addition to the force on page 8?

Mr. CHANCE. Yes, sir. All the work comes over there. The work will be done in that division.

Mr. LITTAUER. Has it been done there in the past?

Mr. CHANCE. It has been done in the agency.

Mr. TAWNEY. What was the character of work they were doing in the stamp agency?

Mr. CHANCE. All requisitions for stamps go to that division, and they are looked up by the stamp agency before they are sent out to the offices.

Mr. TAWNEY. All requisitions for stamps come to the stamp division of the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General?

Mr. CHANCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Those requisitions are filled by the stamp division in the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office?

Mr. CHANCE. Yes, sir. The requisition is passed upon in the stamp division, approved, and sent over.

Mr. TAWNEY. Approved and forwarded——

Mr. CHANCE (interrupting). To the stamp agency.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the stamp agency secure the stamps and ship them to the post-offices?

Mr. CHANCE. They transmit the requisitions to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the stamps are checked up there and sent out. They are sent out by registered mail.

Now, the sum and substance of this whole proposition is simply this: We have here a stamp agency in the city of Washington that is examining the requisitions for postage stamps and checking them off and then sending them over to the Bureau of Printing and Engraving, where the stamps are manufactured. There we have another class of clerks who are again checking them and sending them out by registered mail to the postmasters throughout the country. In the reorganization of the Post-Office Department that work will be done within the division of the Department that exists there at this time, and this reorganization involves, therefore, the abolition or elimination of this particular stamp division. Now, if the Members of the House do not believe that the Postmaster-General is right in saying this service is unnecessary and that he can get along without it and that this stamp agency which to-day practically performs no function whatever that is essential to the public service, then they should strike this provision out of the bill, and this stamp agency with all of its clerks will be continued in the service appropriation bill as heretofore at the expense of the Government and for which the Government will receive nothing in return.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I hope that at least this one member of the Post-Office Committee will not exhibit any feeling in this discussion nor any concern about the mere question of from what committee an appropriation shall come. I want the Committee of the Whole to understand that that is not the question at issue here. The question is, Shall far-reaching legislation be accomplished in this guise by this transfer, confirming the reorganization and without any other reason given for it than that it conforms to organization and is within the recommendation?

Mr. Chairman, if this House wants to provide by legislation that the contract for making postage stamps and stamped envelopes shall always be given in the city of Washington, nobody would be more willing than I that the House should fairly consider that question on its merits. If this House, or the Committee of the Whole, wants to deliberately determine upon the unmixed proposition before it, that these things shall hereafter, contrary to existing law, be manufactured in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, nobody is more willing than I that the committee and the House, after a discussion of that question shall determine upon it——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. And I am not prepared to say I might not even vote——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you maintain that the elimination of this stamp agency here in Washington will necessarily result in terminating the manufacture of stamps in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in this city?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is what I am going to claim and try to demonstrate right now. You hit me just when I got to it. The permanent law provides that these stamps and envelopes shall be manufactured by contract. It came about at the last bidding that the Government, or a bureau of it, became a bidder against the industrial establishments of the country, and without going further into detail how it happened, it came about that that contract was given to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Now, the stamp agencies, which the gentlemen are seeking to destroy, or to transfer into the Department, are absolutely essential to the administration of the contract, for it is an inspection for filling of orders anywhere in the country outside of the city of Washington, and I want to say further that the same work, the same things, the same counting, the same checking, the same everything is just as necessary in the city of Washington as it would be in the city of New York or the city of Buffalo. But now it comes about that because they are being made right here on the ground the departmental officials say we can cover that stamp agency into the Department, and they ask for this legislation.

Now, suppose the Committee of the Whole keeps this provision in this bill and the House adopts it. The very purpose of the Department is fulfilled by legislation when this House was not even under the suspicion that it was passing legislation at all. Then the Third Assistant at the next bidding can say, "Why the law contemplates that this contract shall hereafter go to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing." Congress has transferred the employees from the field force to the Department; Congress has determined that the officials who look after this, who count the stamps and send them out, who check them, who do everything, shall be departmental officials and employees, and, more than that, Congress has taken away all the machinery for administering the contract in any other place than the city of Washington. I do not see how the Postmaster-General is going to give a contract hereafter in any other place because you take away the machinery for its administration; and let me add a sentence, that this is in effect a piece of far-reaching legislation, settling it that the work hereafter is to be performed in Washington, repealing or superseding the contract law as effectually as if it were a lengthy statute for that specific purpose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, we have heard from members of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads reasons why the motion to strike this paragraph from the bill should be sustained. We have heard arguments from members of the Committee on Appropriations why the motion ought not to prevail. Now, I want to submit a few observations from the standpoint of an interested bystander, as a representative in a way of orderly government and of economic administration, having no choice between the personal controversies of these two great committees. Yesterday we struck out of the legislative appropriation bill a paragraph that the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, on whose motion we struck it out, admitted that logically ought to have remained in the bill, and that the provision or paragraph was placed in the bill upon the recommendation of the Postmaster-General. And I helped to strike it out because when we came to hear the whole question it occurred to me there was not much of vital importance in the controversy, but here members of the Committee on Appropriations have stated to the Committee of the Whole House that by retaining this appropriation in the legislative bill there will be a saving of at least $2,500 a year, and therefore there is a substantial reason why this provision should remain in that bill. It involves the abolition of the office of stamp agent, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think the provision should remain in this bill. Gentlemen representing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads admit that the arrangement contained in the legislative bill will result in a saving of money to the Government. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER], however, fears that it foreshadows a policy that will result in the permanent manufacturing of postage stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

I do not know whether that should be the result or not; but it seems to me that is the place where postage stamps ought to be printed. It has been suggested to me that it costs the Government more to print them there than by contract with individuals. In what way? I can not see why it should cost more. In reckoning the cost, gentlemen include a relative share of the entire cost of maintaining the Bureau. If you strike this provision out, do you abolish the Bureau of Printing and Engraving? The public must still maintain that Bureau; they must maintain and pay the rest of the Superintendent and pay the staff surrounding the Superintendent of that Bureau; must pay the expense of lighting and heating, and these expenses have been going right along. The question is how much can be saved in making stamps in that Bureau. Eliminate the fixed element of cost and the stamps can be printed as cheaply, if not more cheaply, in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving as they could under private contract. If by making this change we could abolish the Bureau of Printing and Engraving and save the cost of superintendence, heating and lighting, and other expenses of that Bureau it would be another question; but we have got to pay it anyhow, and why not let the Bureau print the stamps?

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of economy, I propose to vote against the motion to strike out the paragraph. I have a great respect for both of these committees. They are both great legislative organisms, presided over by able and distinguished Members of this body; but I do not like to see members of committees wrangling with each other simply for the prestige of having control of this or that kind of legislation. I think the question ought to be, and I am sure it will be, determined solely upon the proposition as to whether there are any business reasons for the change. If there be business reasons for it, if it will save money to the Government to leave the provisions in the legislative bill, I am sure that the Members of the House will vote to leave it there. If it will not, if it is better economy, better business to transfer the provision to the post-office and post-roads appropriation bill, then I am sure the members of the Committee of the Whole House will vote to make the transfer. But from the arguments that have so far been made from the facts that have been presented to the committee, it seems to me there is but one course to pursue, and that is to vote down the motion to strike out the paragraph and save the Government at least $2,500 a year by doing so.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to section 8 of the pending bill, as contrary to the practice and custom of this Government from its foundation to the present time, unless a service pension is provided for those who have passed the so-called "age limit." I shall oppose it as an injustice to a most deserving class of faithful public servants.

I recall the time when, as a member of the New York City board of education, I aided in the passage of a retirement law for those no longer able to perform their duties as teachers. It was found that many had been in the schools for more than forty years doing faithful work.

The women who had taught thirty years, and were incapacitated, were retired on half pay.

Thirty-five years were required for the men. We have to-day thoroughly capable and efficient men teachers, particularly, above the age of 70 years. No retirement is permitted unless the person is incapacitated, either mentally or physically.

This law has proven a grand success, relieving the schools of an incubus that was weighing it down, not on account of age, but of physical and mental disability, and at the same time placing faithful servants in a comfortable position for the remainder of their lives.

Many men and women at 70 are far more able and efficient than others at 60. I have in mind now the widow of an officer who was killed during the civil war, 82 years of age, a zealous and efficient clerk in the Treasury Department. This is not an exceptional case. There are many other notable cases of men and women above the age of 70 doing good faithful work in the various Departments.

If this proposition becomes law, or is ever seriously considered, it should exempt the brave men who so loyally served their country in the days of 1861 to 1865, and in the war with Spain. They are entitled to that much consideration at the hands of Congress. Let us hope that the nation has not forgotten their patriotic services. Failure in this respect is a sign of the decline of our Republic and of base ingratitude, for which the American people will not stand. You gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee will find it difficult to justify your recommendations before the people next fall, I apprehend.

If this proposition ever becomes law I shall have fears for the future of the Republic. In this connection I desire to read an original poem received from an old and brave soldier—Gen. Horatio C. King, of Brooklyn, N. Y., the secretary of the Society of the Army of the Potomac—written on this proposed legislation.

"GET OUT OF HERE AND DIE."—THE VETERAN'S LAMENT.

Well, Mary Ann, the jig is up;
  I've tramped the livelong day,
And not a friendly hand was raised
  To help me on my way.
"O give me work or I must starve,"
  I plead with tearful eye,
"Oh, you're too old—go drown yourself.
  Get out of here and die."

I wore my medal on my breast,
  That Congress gave, you know,
When I plunged in that fire of hell
  Near fifty years ago.
The General said I saved the day,
  For we were near beat out;
The reenforcements turned their flank
  And drove them in a rout.

The Government—I've tried that, too;
  But though it resolutes
To give the vet'ran preference,
  It does it when it suits
The district leader's surly views,
  That's mighty seldom, for
It's easier to throw us down
  With civil-service law.

So, Mary Ann, just pack my things;
  It ain't no use to try.
There's scarce a morsel in the house—
  If I stay here I'll die.
Perhaps the Soldiers' Home ain't full,
  Maybe they'll take me in;
And then good-by to home and friends,
  To country, and to kin.

I wish to include as a part of my remarks the able and patriotic letter of Comrade James Tanner, commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, bearing on this subject and addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

[From the Grand Army Journal, March 17, 1906.]

MY DEAR MR. TAWNEY: In the report of the House Committee on Appropriations, submitting the legislative and judicial appropriation bill (Report No. 2171, current session, dated March 9, 1906), occurs the following, under the caption "Limitations with respect to the appropriations made in the bill and not heretofore imposed are recommended as follows:"

"SEC. 8. After June 30, 1906, there shall not be employed, in any Executive Department or other Government establishment in the District of Columbia, any person in the classified service who is 65 years of age and under 68 years of age at a rate of annual compensation exceeding $1,400, or who is 68 years of age and under 70 years of age at a rate of annual compensation exceeding $1,200, or who is over 70 years of age at a rate of annual compensation exceeding $840, and after June 30, 1912, no person in the classified service shall be continued in the employment of any such Executive Department or other Government establishment (*) who has attained 70 years of age."

So far as indicated by anything in the report, this recommendation came from the full committee, yet, were the same rule to be applied to those in high as in low places, three members of your committee would have been debarred from signing it, the distinguished Speaker of the House, so active that many people fear he must be reckoned with in 1908, would have to withhold his approval unless you hurry the bill through before May 7, while of the thirteen members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, who have the last guess at this bill, east of the White House, whose average age is 67, all but four, two Democrats and two Republicans, and they by a tight squeeze, would be recused from consideration of your automatic "time register," upon its arrival at the northern wing of the Capitol. A whole lot of people have been having trouble concerning time registers and the like lately. It has been handed down to me since before I began to read, that "he who is faithful in a few things shall be ruler over many," but you reverse all this and enact that the aged man may do great things but shall not be a hewer of wood nor a drawer of water. I think you'd better take water on this proposition, respecting which I have a few earnest words to say to you.

The operation of the proposed penalty for loyal and faithful service would fall so heavily upon those who bore the burden of the battle in the Union Army that I must treat it as if they were the sole beneficiaries. It is for them, my comrades, I speak. I am indignant to shirk this duty I owe them, and could not if I would. They stood with me when to stand meant victory then, that the Congress of the United States should meet ever since and now in Washington instead of Richmond; that the Stars and Stripes should float forever and always over all, emblematic of a united, prosperous, happy country. I venture to say that you won't find a Confederate soldier behind your bill. At this moment I indorsed an earnest request to our soldier President to honor a Confederate brigadier, whom your proposed "limitation" would remove from the waiting list, because, when having the power to promote or discharge a large number of my comrades he placed his recommendation in the hands of his superior if a single one of them was to be disturbed. They are holding down the same desks to-day, with exceptional ability, too; and a delegation of them have just left me filled with the gratitude common to all but republics.

To a proposition that shall provide for a fair reduction when, in individual cases, by the deterioration of his mental or physical faculties a man is incapacitated from measuring up to the full requirements of the service, I have no objection to present, but that condition is now amply provided for by existing law as you can make it. The Departments now have power to demote or discharge for incapacity or any other cause, or for no cause—a power, reviewable by no tribunal, that for a century and a quarter has been absolute. Under it old men and young are daily been assigned, both by promotion and reduction, to the duties for which best fitted. You propose that the almshouse shall be the veteran's refuge in life, and perhaps, after you've kicked him out to "rattle his bones over the stones," will deny him burial in consecrated ground; close against him the gates of Arlington.

When you make a rule arbitrary as this one would be, taking no account of the preservation of faculties and the ability to do full service more valuable to the Government by reason of long years of experience—I have serious objection to it; and when I consider this legislation with reference to my comrades of the Union Army, I have a most positive protest to register in advance of the consummation of the wrong.

According to the best estimate we can make, 75,000 of the Union Army are now living. Providence has blessed these men with a vast aggregation of sons and sons-in-law, and I can not be far out of the way when I assert that the survivors of "the vanishing army" and their allied domestic relations aggregate nearly or quite 5,000,000 voters in this land. Few of this number but directly or indirectly would be affected by the proposed legislation. Many, it is true, only remotely, but as to the veteran and his wife and dependents the reduction and dismissal from wage-earning work, not because of any lessening of wage-earning capacity, but because the old man of to-day was here long enough ago to help save his country in his country's hour of need comes directly home, so the humiliation will be felt by his children and his children's children so long as history endures.

My dear Mr. Chairman, there is a dead line in legislation respecting the saviors of the nation as perfectly marked as at Andersonville, around which no enemy may go. Let me beg you to pause before you attempt to cross it under the belief that the sentry is asleep, and to the only words of praise for the bridge that many times and oft carried you to safety, and, like the belfry in the market place of Ghent, "Thrice burned down and thrice rebuilded, still watches o'er the town."

You may pass this unjust, cruel, monstrous law while the stars remain in the flag and the memories of men and women are not stricken with paresis, but before you do I hope you'll hear Whitcomb Riley recite "Good-bye, Jim; tek keer o' yourself!"

The sage Epictetus once remarked that man never does an unusual thing without a motive. What, I pray you, is behind this mysterious attack upon the Union veteran at this peculiar juncture in affairs? It can not be from any supposed necessity, because, as I have shown, the departments now possess ample authority to prune for incapacity. Is it the copperhead section of the effete East allied to the few western States into which its overflow has wandered? Is it the abnormal, sick greed of young and comparative incapacity which sighs for the men's shoes? Is it playing politics with existing law and conditions? Is it retaliation for the just and humane order that age should be considered a rateable disability in adjusting pensions? Then you're striking the wrong man, although you couldn't hurt him worse than over the shoulders of the helpless veteran. If because the victims of this legislation are nearly all Union veterans, if they are the real and only objective, and because of their services, why not come out in the open and say so, or else say that is not your meaning by exempting them? Is it the dandruff from the sore heads of 1903? I have exhausted the list of possible explanations.

When the victorious columns of Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan marched down Pennsylvania avenue in 1865, they found swung across the Treasury a great banner bearing the legend, "The only debt this country can never repay nor forget is the debt it owes its defenders." Was this "Lest we forget?"

On March 3, 1865, almost forty-one years to a day from the action of your committee, when every nerve in this country was stretched to the breaking and every man and fragment of a man able to hold a gun was encouraged, even impressed, to hold it, when the whole world wondered if the pendulum would swing back again, the Congress at Washington adopted the following joint resolutions now enacted into the Revised Statutes, viz:

SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

SEC. 1755. In grateful recognition of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of persons honorably discharged from the military and naval forces of the country, by reason of wounds, disease, or the expiration of terms of enlistment, it is respectfully recommended to bankers, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, farmers, and persons engaged in industrial pursuits to give them the preference for appointment to remunerative situations and employments."

There was an implied promise in this that no citizen would dare to disregard if made in his private business, and because of it, perhaps more than any other one cause, a million men went home from the field of war to the quiet, everyday pursuits of peace without disturbance or excitement. A grateful people, grateful then, promised even the disabled work and pay; you cast out the hale and halt alike; condemn the soldier for living—until now.

March 3, 1903, there was taken from the House Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, of which Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, now your committee, was chairman, and against his vigorous protest, the only measure so honored during the late lamented Speaker Henderson's term, a bill to amend section 1754, Revised Statutes, supra, so as to apply its provisions to all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors both in the matter of appointment and retention in civil offices and employments. Under suspension of the rules this bill was passed by an overwhelming majority of the House and sent to the Senate, where it failed by reason only of the confusion attending the closing hours of the session; but it marked the sentiment of the House of the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Chapter 287, act approved August 15, 1876, page 120, Supplement Revised Statutes, reads:

* * * Provided, That in making any reduction of force in any of the Executive Departments the head of such Department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, and the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors."

With the following all of us are familiar:

"EXECUTIVE ORDER.

"The attention of the Departments is hereby called to the provisions of the laws giving preference to veterans in appointment and retention. The President desires that whenever the needs of the service will justify it and the laws will permit preference shall be given alike in appointment and retention to honorably discharged veterans of the civil war who are fit and qualified to perform the duties of the places which they seek or are filling.

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

"WHITE HOUSE, January 17, 1902."

When you reflect that all of the above statutes, Executive orders, and long practice would be repealed by your proposed section 8, I think I do not charge me with extravagance in characterizing the introduction thereto in your report, "Limitation not heretofore imposed," as the mildest-mannered expression ever used to scuttle the ship of state.

This letter is, of course, you understand, wholly impersonal. I happen to be the official representative of my comrades as you are of the powerful committee that, like "the hand that rocks the world," dominates the affairs of the nation.

I write not in anger but in deep sorrow, for it is my country and my comrades with whom I've so long touched elbows in whose name this wrong is being done. They counted not the cost in the days of their youth, health, and strength; now they're almost at the turn of the tide; nearly all in. For years they have given to the Government civil life the same earnest, hard-working, faithful, loyal service that they gave in time of war; for years to come their very experience will be of incalculable value. Your bill makes their superior competency an absolute disqualification because of the years taken to acquire it. In the civil service, as in the Army or Navy, it is the "man behind the gun" upon whom we lean most heavily; who does the things that get into general orders under some one else's name; but what would we do without him?

This subject is one which, by the very emphasis of our declining years, stands closer to the representatives of "the vanishing army" than any other obligation on earth except to our God and country. I shall be pardoned therefore, I am sure, for speaking long and feelingly.

Our comrades in the Government are, by the circumstances of their positions, powerless to defend themselves. I beg you to speak for instead of against them if you can not leave them alone.

With the assurance of my distinguished consideration, I have the honor to be,

Truly, your obedient servant,

JAMES TANNER,
Commander in Chief.

Hon. JAMES A. TAWNEY,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that debate upon this paragraph be closed in eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks the committee that debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in eight minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Make it ten minutes; I want to have a few minutes myself.

Mr. LITTAUER. I ask unanimous consent that debate be closed, Mr. Chairman, in ten minutes; that five minutes be occupied by the gentleman representing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and five minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in ten minutes; five minutes of the time to be occupied by the gentleman on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and five minutes by the gentleman from New York. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask to be recognized four minutes, reserving by agreement with the chairman of the committee one minute to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized for four minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish at the outset, Mr. Chairman, to disclaim any feeling whatsoever on the part of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads as to retaining this legislation in the Post-Office bill, and stating without reservation that our duty purpose is for the best interest of the service. Here we have an item carried in the Post-Office appropriation bill of more than half a million dollars for the manufacture of postage stamps, and the great Committee on Appropriations, that seems to be so throughly versed in this subject, argues that because there may be a possible saving of $1,000 by the elimination of the chief clerk of this agency, this stamp agency should be abolished and the supervision of the manufacture of stamps, in case the contract is let during the coming year to a private contractor, and before the assembling of Congress, would be lacking. There is at present in the Post-Office supply bill provision for two other agencies of a like character, for the supervision of the postal cards and stamped envelopes manufactured at different places by private contractors.

Do away with this postal agency, according to the arguments made by the Committee on Appropriations, and the result is merely this: That it seeks to change the designation of the chief clerk of the stamp agency and with the clerks transfer them to the departmental service, and have them continue in the same identical class of duties without any other change. This contract for the manufacture of stamps runs for four years and will be let before the next assembling of Congress. If this agency is done away with, there will be no authority on the part of the departmental officials to detail any clerks to supervise the service, under half a million-dollar contract, in the manufacture of Government postage stamps, which is the same thing as Government money. And yet this committee, under the plea of economy, asks us to take that unheard-of step when we are on the brink of letting this contract for four years, and to discontinue this agency.

I say that, granting all possible strength to the argument made by the Committee on Appropriations and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], it would be well for this committee to hesitate until the next legislative session before discontinuing this stamp agency, and see whether this contract is going to be let to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing or to an outside concern. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General stated in the hearings before the Post-Office Committee that this contract may very likely be let to an outside private concern. The law to-day vests him with that privilege, to let it to the lowest bidder, whether a private contractor or public agency. If you are going to cut off this agency now and later let a contract for this work to a private concern next October, to run for three months without any supervision whatsoever, you are undertaking a step that is going to result not in economy, but perhaps in great recklessness and great possible loss to the Government. It is false economy for the members of the Committee on Appropriations to say that there will be a saving when they are only detailing another official to do work that is now performed by the chief clerk. To safeguard the interests of the Government this stamp agency should be continued; and if so, it properly belongs to the postal service and should be carried in the Post-Office supply bill.

I yield the balance of my time to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a few facts. The manufacture of postage stamps has for a dozen years been carried on at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, here in Washington. It has necessitated an increase of plant, and I believe some extension of the building. We have a well-equipped manufacturing plant now for making these stamps. I notice that the gentlemen of the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee who are deriding our attempt to save money here submit in the bill that will shortly be considered by this House, not the provision for the manufacture of adhesive stamps and special-delivery stamps carried in their service bill last year, for which there was an appropriation of $420,000, but they seek this year to change existing law, and, from their statements, one would expect economy, for certainly there could be no other purpose in their proposal to change existing law. They submit as follows:

For the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, special delivery stamps, and books of stamps, $550,000.

This year's appropriation, $420,000; next year's proposal, $550,000, but they add to this large increase for this purpose the proviso that is going to bring around the economy, and which of course changes existing law:

Provided, That no contract for the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, special delivery stamps, or books of stamps, shall be made by the Government with any Department or Bureau of the Government at any higher rate than offered for the same work by any responsible private contractor; nor shall the bid of such Department or Bureau be at a price below the cost of such work to the Government.

Now, evidently these gentlemen are taking great care to see that this work of manufacturing postage stamps shall be, if possible, taken away from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; and how the economy is coming about I can not understand, for here the Government stands with its plant, prepared to do this work, and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing evidently must have produced the stamps needed with the appropriation of $420,000 during the current year. Here comes the submission of a proposed item of $550,000 for next year for exactly the same work and, of course, all in the line of economy. Now, I know as a fact for years past the stamp agency has been of no use, and there have been repeated attempts made to get rid of the chief of this division.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why do you not provide for the pay for the manufacture of these stamps?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am addressing myself now to what is before the committee and not to anything that does not concern the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The clerks have been transferred to other work in the Departments. The Department comes to us and says, "We do not need this chief. We can save $2,500 a year."

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon—$2,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Two thousand five hundred dollars, I have been told. Moreover, this $2,500 stamp agent is provided for in the postal-service bill in this indeterminate fashion:

For pay of agent and assistants to distribute stamps, and expenses of agency, $11,280.

A lump sum for the agency, including all salaries. We take it over in this bill on the advice of the head of this Department, so that it will result in a saving, realizing that the work of the stamp agency is not being performed. We submit it here, providing for these clerks, but providing for each one of them at a specific salary—one clerk of class 3, one clerk of class 2, four clerks at $900, and one clerk at $840—in detail, as the provision for such forces ought to be made. We put these clerks in the bill here to take the place of other clerks who otherwise would have had to be employed. We think that we are doing what is right, under existing circumstances. We do not look forward to a change of existing law under the postal-service bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, there are two points that I wish the gentleman would make; one is that we have expended hundreds of thousands of dollars in a plant for this work; the other is that the last time we contracted for the manufacture of these stamps they were inferior and not by any means satisfactory.

Mr. LITTAUER. I feel that I have called the attention of the committee to the fact that we have an elaborate plate plant established here, where stamps are produced in a satisfactory way. I do not believe it can be good policy for us to throw obstacles in the way of turning out work where it is now going on in a satisfactory manner. The only object of continuing the agent is to provide for the contingency that would arise provided the contract was taken away from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, just a word. It is immaterial where the stamps are manufactured. It is necessary, however, that wherever they are manufactured there should be some agency on the part of the Government as a check in the count of these stamps and save the Government harmless from any loss by fraud of the contractor. As a matter of fact, the agent and the clerks are not now in the Department. They are in a separate building in the city of Washington because the contract is in this city. If the contract should go away the agency would go away also.

It has been carried in this form for years in the bill providing for appropriations for the postal service, and for the first time in the history of the Government an attempt is made to pass upon this bill by the Committee on Appropriations. I sincerely hope the committee will sustain the motion and strike the language from the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. OVERSTREET) there were—ayes 28, noes 53.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. OVERSTREET and Mr. LITTAUER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 47, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the last paragraph read. In the confusion I omitted to offer some verbal changes in the line of others already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment to a paragraph which has already been passed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What paragraph does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. LITTAUER. At the bottom of page 134, the previous paragraph to the one we have been discussing. I want to offer an amendment there in line with those already adopted; they are merely verbal changes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 134, line 2, strike out the words "classification division," and insert "division of classification;" on page 134, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "of registry system" and insert "division of registry mail;" lines 21 and 22 strike out "classification division" and insert "division of classification."

The amendments were considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General: For Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,500; chief clerk, $2,500; superintendent rural free-delivery service, $3,000; supervisor of rural free-delivery service, $2,000; 2 clerks of class 4; 4 clerks of class 3; 15 clerks of class 2; 41 clerks of class 1; stenographer, $1,600; stenographer, $1,200; 36 clerks, at $1,000 each; 42 clerks, at $900 each; page, $480; 3 messengers, 7 assistant messengers, and 6 laborers; in all, $202,900.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, page 135, strike out the words "rural free-delivery service" and insert "division of rural delivery;" in line 21 strike out the words "supervisor of rural free-delivery service" and insert "assistant superintendent division of rural delivery."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman what is intended by this amendment?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is just a change of verbiage.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. As I understood the amendment, it is to strike out the word "rural."

Mr. LITTAUER. This is the language which the Postmaster-General asks to insert.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There are two deliveries—the rural free delivery and the city delivery.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have got this language exactly as the Postmaster-General recommended. It contemplates no change in the service whatever.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does it make the superintendent of the rural free delivery the superintendent of the city delivery?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The amendment simply strikes out the word "free."

Mr. LITTAUER. That is all.

The amendments were considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Office of the Attorney-General: For compensation of the Attorney-General, $8,000; Solicitor-General, $7,500; assistant to the Attorney-General, $7,000; 5 Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each; Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, $4,500; solicitor of internal revenue, $4,500; Solicitor for the Department of State, $4,500; 2 assistant attorneys, at $3,000 each; 4 assistant attorneys, at $2,750 each; assistant attorney, $2,000; 2 assistant attorneys, at $2,750 each; 1 assistant attorney, $2,000; 1 assistant attorney, $2,000; assistant attorney in charge of dockets, $2,500; law clerk and examiner of titles, $2,700; chief clerk and ex officio superintendent of the building, $2,500; superintendent of buildings, $250; private secretary to the Attorney-General, $2,500; clerk to the Attorney-General, $1,600; stenographer to the Solicitor-General, $1,600; 2 confidential clerks, at $1,600 each; 2 law clerks, at $2,000 each; 1 law clerk of class 4; attorney in charge of pardons, $2,100; disbursing clerk, $2,750; appointment clerk, $2,000; 5 clerks of class 4; 9 clerks of class 3; 4 clerks of class 2; 8 clerks of class 1; telegraph operator and stenographer, $1,200; 1 clerk, $1,000; 11 clerks, at $900 each; chief messenger, $1,000; 2 messengers; 6 assistant messengers; 4 laborers; 3 watchmen; engineer, $1,200; assistant engineer, $900; 3 firemen; 2 conductors of the elevator, at $720 each; 8 charwomen. Division of accounts: Chief of division of accounts, $2,500; chief bookkeeper and record clerk, $2,000; 3 clerks of class 4; 5 clerks of class 3; 7 clerks of class 2; 6 clerks of class 1; 2 clerks, at $900 each; 1 packer, $840; in all, $220,360.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 140, line 5, after the word "thousand," insert the words "four hundred."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this is purely to correct a typographical error. We are simply restoring the salary to what it now stands in current law, but in the printing of the bill the words "four hundred" were omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That clerks employed on June 30, 1905, under the appropriation "Insular and Territorial affairs, Department of Justice," may be, in the discretion of the Attorney-General, transferred to the places provided for them under the appropriation "Salaries, Department of Justice, 1907," without reference to the act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883, and without reference to the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 141, strike out the paragraph beginning with line 12 down to and inclusive of line 21.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if it had not been for the extraordinary rule adopted by the House I would have made a point of order against this provision. I was somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] should not have excepted this particular provision from the operation of the rule, recognizing his stanch friendship for the civil-service system of the United States. Some time prior to 1905, by reason of extraordinary conditions existing in the affairs of the Government, a temporary force of clerks was authorized and employed in the Department of Justice in the insular and territorial division. Since that time the necessity for these clerks has ceased. They are no longer utilized in the temporary employment for which they were obtained. They have been since that time utilized by the Department of Justice in the transaction of the ordinary affairs of that Department. I am unable to ascertain from the hearings the number of clerks that are to be covered into the service by this provision. This illustrates how the expenses of administration have grown so enormously during the past few years without Members of Congress having been able to keep track of them. Here is a force of clerks never estimated for by the Department for its ordinary work, never contemplated by Congress to be added to the ordinary force of the Department, but by this innocent provision covered into the civil-service force and permanently added to the regular force of the Government. This is not an isolated case. Two or three years back some sixty-six clerks obtained for temporary purposes in the War Department during the war with Spain by a similar provision, if I be not mistaken, in this legislative bill were also added to the permanent force of clerks in the War Department. These clerks have not been estimated for by the Department in the ordinary and usual manner as necessary for the transaction of its business. They were obtained because of great emergencies, because of extraordinary conditions that existed in connection with the obtaining of the insular possessions during the Spanish war.

When those conditions ceased these clerks should have been dropped from the service of the Government. Instead of doing that, the Department of Justice has worked these men into places in its regular force, so that it has increased its permanent force by this staff, which costs twenty-five thousand and some odd dollars.

Mr. Chairman, although it is a vicious way to increase the force of this Department without the committee giving some scrutiny or having an opportunity to investigate as thoroughly as if the Department had regularly estimated for them, I have still another objection to this provision. It takes men who were appointed to office through favoritism, influence—political influence—selected by men who had the opportunity to put them in office temporarily, and fastens them into the permanent clerical force of the Government, while the average candidate for a place in the Government—the citizen in my district, the citizen in the districts of every other Member of this House, unless with that peculiar influence that would obtain a place in this temporary force—is compelled to take the civil-service examination and to wait his turn.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. How many places are transferred in this force?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have just stated that the hearings do not disclose that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Let me tell the gentleman that there are nine and that five of them are exempt from civil-service regulations.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield to allow me to ask a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not true that the President, by Executive order amending the civil-service rules, could transfer these clerks without the action of Congress?

Mr. LITTAUER. He could.

Mr. MANN. What is the object in having Congress direct the President to do something that he could do himself?

Mr. LITTAUER. This makes provision by action of Congress for these four men in the classified service. I suppose the President, by order, could hardly have covered any clerks into the service. He could cover them in, I suppose, if he wanted to classify them.

Mr. MANN. The President could use the same language in a rule which the committee uses here, and has frequently done so with reference to these temporary clerks. I think this is the first case where Congress——

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no, no.

Mr. MANN. These things have usually gone out on points of order, and the President has usually then made his Executive order.

Mr. LITTAUER. No; I think the temporary clerks in the War Department were transferred into the regular service by action of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question on a little bit of ancient history in regard to temporary clerks. What has become of about 1,600 Spanish war temporary clerks, who were covered in, as it were, or made, by a sweeping provision in some one of the appropriation bills, a part of the permanent force of the Treasury Department?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Treasury Department?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, some Department.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think you will find that the largest force of temporary clerks was in the War Department, and they were covered in after a number of years of elimination; that a large part of the temporary clerks was covered regularly into the service.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They are still in?

Mr. LITTAUER. They are still in and will probably remain in.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the Spanish war is ended?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am not going to defend the practice in general, but let us come to the facts in this particular case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wanted to find out about that because I protested against it, and the gentleman from New York is the gentleman who had it done. The record will show that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, we did that after three years of calling the attention of the War Department to it and telling them to take out fifty clerks next year, and eliminating them in that number, and when we got it down to a basis that they said the services of these clerks were necessary and through experience they had become efficient, then we put the proposition to the House, and the House accepted it, and what was left of the temporary clerks were transferred into the permanent force.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The House did not unanimously, for I stood up here and protested against it.

Mr. LITTAUER. I did not say unanimously.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I stood up here and fought it not only on the parliamentary proposition, but on the merits of the case. Now, I presume, they are permanently foisted upon the Government, although we have peace.

Mr. LITTAUER. And we have no testimony before us at present that their services are not required.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And you put them in after the war was over, too; changed them from the status of temporary to permanent clerks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did appear in this very session of Congress, Mr. Chairman, that the clerical force in the War Department is costing $60,000 more to-day than it did during the time of the Spanish war, when the greatest number of clerks was needed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And they are working day and night.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York says this is a small matter; it only covered four clerks. Well, it happens in this instance that perhaps there are only four left. Fortunately it must be, indeed, for us, Mr. Chairman, that it does not cover forty-four, because I am confident that my colleague could plead just as eloquently for the forty-four as he does for these four clerks who have been covered. Nine places altogether, at an expense of $25,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Sixteen thousand nine hundred dollars, please.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I read:

Mr. LITTAUER. On page 247 of the bill I see that the appropriations for the office of the Attorney-General for last year were $211,040, plus an additional amount of $25,000 carried in the sundry civil bill for insular and Territorial affairs.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, let me state to you, $25,000 was appropriated and but $16,900 used.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, then, whatever it may be, $16,600, at any rate, covered these four clerks. More fortunately, then, that the entire $25,000 had not been used; but I am opposed to this system, this method of increasing the force in the Departments. These clerks have never been estimated for in the ordinary and lawful manner provided by law. No estimate has been made for these clerks, but the request comes from the Department that they be covered into the service in violation of the law and in detriment to the interest of every clerk who is on the civil-service list waiting the opportunity to which he is entitled to be taken in in compliance with the law. Now, it is said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask two minutes to conclude.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One of the reasons urged for this method of taking employees into the Government service is that they are peculiarly efficient; that the head of the Department originally having the right of selection, has exercised it in a manner that has resulted in better clerks than he could obtain through the civil-service law; that by reason of their experience they have become so efficient that the Government should not lose their service. That argument, Mr. Chairman, is urged by every head of a Department that comes before the committee asking for increases in the clerical force. If it it be not good, if the reasons be accurate, then the civil-service law should be repealed. If the civil-service system is proper, and the law is good, then it should be enforced without any favoritism and the permanent employees in the Government taken into the service under the operations of the law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will make a short statement with reference to this item. For a number of years, not prior to, but subsequent to the Spanish war, the sundry civil appropriation bill provided $25,000 for insular and territorial affairs of the Department of Justice. We found last year that this lump sum appropriation was being carried along from year to year and determined, and so instructed, that in the present year regular estimates of the force and salaries paid should be submitted to Congress. The Department called attention to the fact that it did not use the entire appropriation, but that there were nine assistant attorneys and law clerks and other clerks paid for out of this fund, aggregating, in all, salaries of $16,900, that the particular purposes of the bureau were not sufficient to keep the force employed, and they were doing general work, and the Department desired that these individuals should be covered into their regular force, there being necessity for their services during the coming year, as there had been in the past. They suggested to us that as so large a number of this force was subject to the civil-service regulations, only four of these being outside of the civil service, and these four having demonstrated that they were well able to conduct the work, that they were efficient clerks, and recommended that we transfer the entire force within the classified service. Now, it is true, that we do, as to these four clerks, violate proper civil-service regulations, but here are clerks performing this work, having performed it for a number of years satisfactorily to the Department, and we felt that it was but in the proper line of legislation to cover them in altogether, and so recommended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt whatever that the clerks ought to be transferred. While it is contrary to the spirit of civil-service law, I have no doubt the recommendation the committee makes is for good government, so far as the transfer is concerned; but I do not believe that Congress ought to usurp the functions of the executive with reference to these regulations. The executive is responsible for the appointments. The executive is responsible for the fulfillment of their duties by these officials. The executive has the power, under the law as it now stands, to transfer these clerks by a mere order of the President; and these orders are not so few or far between that it would create a precedent to anybody's injury. There have been many orders issued by the President, properly enough, exempting certain persons from the provisions of the civil-service rules and providing for their transfer; and it will be an easy matter with these clerks for the executive to transfer these four clerks or forty clerks, if there were forty, without regard to the civil-service rule. Now, I notice here——

Mr. LITTAUER. Why should we appeal to the executive when we find a case that recommends itself to our own judgment?

Mr. MANN. Oh, why should the executive appeal to us? It is the Department that has appealed to you for the transfer. You are not appealing to the Department. The Department of Justice has asked you to make the transfer. I say the Department of Justice ought to appeal to the President or the Civil Service Commission, another branch of the executive, and not put the burden on Congress. Why, we go out of here and the Civil Service Reform League will say that Congress violates the law; that Congress does this and that in violation of the civil-service law; that Congress defies the spirit of the civil-service law, when in truth it is the executive department that is doing it.

The provision which we now have under consideration provides for a transfer, not from one Department to another, it is true, but from one position or one salary allowance to another. Under section 5 of the bill, which seems to me to be very objectionable, the committee proposes to restrict any transfer until after a person has served three years in a Department from which he desires to be transferred. While this provision now under consideration does not contravene the wording of section 5, it contravenes, to a certain extent at least, the spirit of it. I believe that Congress ought to make the appropriations for these officials; ought to prescribe the duties that they are to perform, and then to hold the executive responsible for their right performance of duty and for their proper official placement as provided under the civil-service law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On that appearance, Mr. Chairman, I will ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 36.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation at not more than $10 per day and actual necessary traveling expenses of special agents to investigate trade conditions abroad, with the object of promoting the foreign commerce of the United States, $30,000; and the results of such investigation shall be reported to Congress.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to submit a question to the gentleman from New York. What are the particular functions that these gentlemen exercise?

Mr. LITTAUER. These gentlemen are special agents, sent abroad for the purpose of investigating the conditions of trade there and reporting them fully, with a view to trade extension. It is claimed that they have brought reports of some value. A good deal of the work of the Bureau of Manufactures is dependent upon the dissemination of intelligence brought home. These reports are similar to consular reports, but altogether more elaborate and specialized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated exactly what I conceive to be the condition. The work done by these traveling inspectors is in the line of consular reports and consular work. It is a duplication, an unnecessary duplication, of work that has on the whole been very well done by our consular representatives, and, in my judgment, it is an inexcusable expense upon the people. The effort is being made from time to time to duplicate the work of various Departments of the Government. It has been alleged, with some show of truth, that the Department of Commerce and Labor and the Department of Agriculture are making duplicate reports with reference to crops. Here, on the admission of the gentleman from New York, we have a duplication of the work being done by the consular representatives. It has been brought to the knowledge of all Members of this Congress that a proposition is now pending before some committee to appoint a particular commission to go out into the world to hunt up trade, governmental drummers, I suppose they might be called. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, having had some connection with the particular trade that this commission which it is intended to create will have to deal, I want to say that no matter how well they may discharge their commission they can not bring to the attention of that particular trade any facts which are not already well known to those engaged in it. Believing that this paragraph is a useless expense, I move, sir, that it be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question about this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 144 strike out lines 19 to 24, both inclusive.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to know how many of these agents are appointed.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think three or four.

Mr. PERKINS. How many years have they been appropriated for?

Mr. LITTAUER. Last year was the first year.

Mr. PERKINS. How much are they paid?

Mr. MANN. Ten dollars a day.

Mr. PERKINS. In addition to that their expenses are paid, amounting in all to $30,000 a year.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no; they are paid $10 a day—

For compensation at not more than $10 per day and actual necessary traveling expenses.

Mr. PERKINS. Then their salaries are $3,600 a year, and in addition to that their expenses. Does not the gentleman anticipate that there will be carried on the appropriation bill a permanent expenditure from year to year of $30,000 to provide for these three gentlemen to travel around the world just as long as they can get this appropriation continued? And is the gentleman in favor of it himself?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not been able to come to a conclusion whether or not this service is worthy of enlargement. The Department of Commerce and Labor came to us this year and asked $100,000 instead of $30,000. Those in charge of the Bureau of Manufactures claim, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor claims, that a great development in the way of manufactures in this country is coming through this sort of special agents' work to bring to the attention of our manufacturers information as to the requirements of foreign markets, and thus foster and promote our trade. It was stated to us that Germany expends a very large sum of money for this purpose. The Department of Commerce and Labor sought to have this appropriation increased, claiming that the daily reports sent out from the Bureau of Manufactures are of incalculable value to manufacturers of this country. I spent last evening reading letters from a great many manufacturers addressed to the Department of Commerce and Labor attesting the value of this work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman says that the reports of these drummers are published?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; and sent out by the Bureau of Manufactures. I have not realized personally any great benefit was to come from this work, but other governments do carry it on in an extensive fashion, much larger than we have ever attempted to do. Those in charge of the work are impressed with the fact that it has resulted in great benefit and that the demand for these reports will constantly grow.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that his committee should not go ahead with this unless it sees the good that comes from it?

Mr. LITTAUER. The committee was impressed with the statement made, but perhaps I was least convinced.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman if it has benefited his business any?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; it has not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman because I know he is a merchant and ought to know.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman know that any men traveling in the way these agents are are able to get letters addressed to Congress asking for the continuation of this thing and that thing and commending it?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And these letters are not impressive to men who know that fact.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think that if the attention of the committee were called to the letters mentioned in the Secretary's testimony about the report on Brazil and the report on Canada, as well as the report on China, accompanying which a great number of samples was forwarded—samples, for instance, of the character of the buttons used in China and the character and colors demanded in printed calicoes, which have been photographed and sent to chambers of commerce and to merchants all over the United States—they would be impressed by them. From these merchants they do receive letters testifying that this information is of value to them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman know that the manufacturers undertaking to engage in this trade will get that information for themselves?

Mr. LITTAUER. I felt so, but those in charge claimed not, and they do show letters which demonstrate their position based on facts that have been brought to them.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I only yielded for a question, which has been answered. It seems to me that this appropriation should be stricken out. It is perfectly evident that the members of the committee do not believe in this appropriation. We all know that there is not a single branch of the Government that will not come before the Appropriations Committee and ask for $30,000, for $100,000, for any amount, and produce letters, which can be got for any appropriation, testifying to its utility. We have the same claim made in behalf of the Bureau of Statistics, with its great expense. We have agents employed in the consular government with agents superintending them, and here is a new branch of expenditure that merely duplicates other work. It is here now for its third year at $30,000 expense, asked to be increased to $100,000, when the committee themselves, by their representative here, as any one of us can see, have no faith or belief in it. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will strike out this provision.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman investigated the work that these persons have done?

Mr. PERKINS. I know about the work; I receive the reports which are sent to us every day, and which we throw in the wastebasket, that somebody has written from somewhere in South Africa or in South America giving information that can be obtained from other sources.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman throw all of his reports in the wastebasket without reading them?

Mr. PERKINS. I have sometimes read them, and I base my action on past experience and throw them in the basket.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman is hardly qualified to speak of what they contain.

Mr. PERKINS. I have read many of them. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Does the gentleman from Illinois think it is wise to add a new source of expenditure, a new bureau of employment in the shape of a traveling force, which every year will grow larger and larger, in order to perform for the Department of Commerce a duplicate of the work which we are supposed to have done by our consuls?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Illinois can get the floor, in two minutes he will answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, right in point with the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS], I want to submit a few remarks indorsing what he has said. The gentleman from Illinois asked the gentleman from New York if he threw his reports in the waste-paper basket, reports that we receive every morning, including Sundays. I will tell the gentleman frankly that I do. I can not read over all the rot that the Government of the United States sends me to read. I would have no time to read the live matters that the people of this country expect me to read and that I must attend to every day here in the House and at home.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How does the gentleman discriminate?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In this way: This daily bulletin comes out in a consular book, which is bound and published every month or every six months, and everything that we get every morning before breakfast we get ultimately in a bound volume. So this bulletin is a direct and deliberate duplication of work and information.

Mr. PALMER. But what would be the good of it if you did not get it until six months after it was published?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You can find the same identical matter in the bound consular reports that you find in this slip. If I happen to want to investigate something about foreign commerce I sit down and write to the Department and they send me the information, since it is the business of that Department to get up information on the particular point, and they answer it if they can. Instead of that we have here the whole face of Congressional territory blanketed with these unnecessary reports—I will not say unnecessary; they may be entirely necessary in a consular form, but I mean an unnecessary duplication. Our consuls are paid for this identical work, and these things we get before breakfast every morning are but brief statements of what the consul elaborately sets forth in his reports which are published. Now, that costs a great deal of money. They must have a printing bureau to print it. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] if that is not the fact, or where is it printed?

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that this information first comes out in these daily reports that are sent out, and it then comes out in another form in the monthly and six-monthly reports of the Consular Bureau, and you can get it all by going to another branch of the Government and getting it from the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PERKINS. There you will find this information published at great cost.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. PERKINS. You will find the substance of it, but not the wording.

Mr. MANN. Nor the substance.

Mr. PERKINS. All these statistics are actually gathered in the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. LITTAUER. These reports do not deal principally with statistics.

Mr. PERKINS. But the Bureau of Statistics deals in these things.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I can not stand more than one New York gentleman at a time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] will please answer my question. He is an expert as to printing burdens, and I will ask him where is this little morning slip—this commercial billet-doux—we get before breakfast printed?

Mr. PERKINS. It is printed by the Government and paid for by the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where?

Mr. PERKINS. At the Government Printing Office.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; and we have a Bureau of Manufactures that edits it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; I think it is edited there.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; and we have printers for it and editors for it and collectors for it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, our consuls do identically the work that these correspondents or drummers must themselves duplicate, and, if we have one international drummer now, next year we will have four or five and next year eight or ten, and where is this matter going to end, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] suggested? Our commerce is increased by selling the foreigner cheaper goods than we sell our own people? That is the drummer we are employing?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would state that one of the purposes of these special agents is to broaden out our trade, and we are very anxious in the South to sell cotton goods to Japan and China and the Orient generally.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it is the business of the Federal Government to go to Europe to drum up the cotton or any other trade?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; nor to drum up new varieties of cotton seed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The whole country is in favor of it, not only the rural districts, but the boards of trade and the Presidents are in favor of it, and this is asked by the boards of trade and the organizations of the South and West, to get broader markets for them for their cotton and sirup and other goods. This is the beginning of a process to bring that about. Does the gentleman object to that?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As the gentleman puts it, yes, I object to the Government hiring an agent to transact my private business or yours. I say that the beef and eggs, even if they are goose eggs, or any other sort that come from my farm, etc., are my private business, and the Government has no business sending a drummer anywhere to attend to drum up a customer to buy them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman object to the morning bulletins?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do, because I think it is a waste.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They give you the information thirty days earlier than the book that is bound does.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I could get up, as I do, pretty early in the morning and breakfast by 7 o'clock and, as I have often done, write a letter to the Department and get the identical information I want inside of eighteen hours.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the gentleman gets it out of this pamphlet.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I get it from Mr. Secretary Metcalf and the statistical bureau.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There is no statistical bureau, except this one now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, it is the same thing, it is the old one in a new form. I say the whole thing is an extravagance, this morning commercial billet-doux, because it is a duplication, and I think this commercial drummer is a superfluity and ought not to be allowed at the expense of the people.

Mr. MANN. Will my distinguished friend yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think, after all, the Government might appropriate a little money for the purpose of extending commerce instead of appropriating quite so much for Farmers' Bulletins, to the extent of 15,000 for each Member of Congress?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Farmers' Bulletin is sent to the farmer who as a rule has no money, or very little. The great big boards of trade and great big manufacturers, the steel plants, armor-plate plants, the trust plants of this country, have untold millions to send out their drummers in order to extend their commerce to foreign countries, and do so, while the farmer can not.

Mr. MANN. The difference in principle to my friend is only the wealth of the person?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And these Farmers' Bulletins are not duplicated either.

Mr. MANN. A good many Farmers' Bulletins are duplicated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken, with all due respect to his great knowledge of departmental matters, but even if they are duplicated, they give information to the man who wants it, because he has no money to get it in any other form. They may be reprinted because the supply is exhausted, not duplicated, however.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I must admit that the value and importance of the work provided for by this item did not make a serious impression upon me at the time it was presented to the subcommittee when it had its hearings. I do feel, though, that it is due the able gentleman at the head of the Department of Commerce and Labor that a full exposition of it should be laid before this committee. As a matter of fact, this item provides for the continued service of four special agents to promote the foreign commerce of the United States, at an expense not to exceed $30,000. One has been making investigations of trade conditions in China, another in Japan, another in Brazil, and another in Mexico and Canada. As I understand it, they have practically completed their labors and the result of their labors published in the Consular Reports, and it is claimed by the head of the Department of Commerce and Labor that these reports have attracted wide attention and are of great value to merchants and manufacturers. The par-leather report submitted by Mr. Hutchinson concerning trade conditions in Brazil is the most comprehensive, the most valuable document of that kind ever submitted to the manufacturers of America, and will result to their great profit. The report of trade conditions in Mexico is about ready for publication and is said to be especially important, especially to merchants and tradesmen.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. By how many other chiefs of bureau who appeared before your committee has a similar claim been made in behalf of the work which they do?

Mr. BURLESON. No other chief of bureau is engaged in doing this character of work or is directing or controlling this character of investigation.

Mr. PERKINS. But how many claim the work they are doing, whatever it may be, is the most valuable work rendered to the Government?

Mr. BURLESON. They all exalt the importance of the work they are doing, and I think it is proper and desirable that they should exalt the importance of the particular work that they are engaged in doing. If they were not interested in their work, if they did not believe in its great importance themselves, I would be constrained to believe—in fact, would feel sure—that they were not proper selections to be placed in charge of the bureau. But that has no bearing upon the issue we are now discussing. These reports are beyond the scope of the ordinary reports, which are made by our consular officers and printed in the ordinary way. It is true these special reports are printed as consular reports are printed, being reviewed in the Bureau of Manufactures and distributed in the same way, but the Secretary of Commerce and Labor came before us and was so seriously impressed with the importance of the results already accomplished by these agents that he earnestly urged upon the subcommittee that the breadth and scope of the work be extended and an appropriation of more than double this amount be allowed. He insisted—earnestly insisted—that our manufacturers and merchants were insisting—yes, demanding—that this work should be continued. The German Empire is engaged in prosecuting endeavors along this same line, and unquestionably it has brought great results to the manufacturers of Germany. They have been able through this very instrumentality, or through work of this character, to extend, within the last few years, their trade as it has not been extended within decades and decades before.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether the manufacturers themselves could at their own expense have secured the services of the very character of men upon whom they have heretofore been relying at Government expense?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, I doubt not they could, and probably by reason of the vast accumulation of wealth they have been able to gather together under an oppressive tariff they could, independent of Government aid, secure this information; but it has been the policy of the Government to do this work through the consular officers, and the appropriation carried in this item has and proposes to broaden the scope of the work being done through the consular service. Now, I submit the question to you. In the light of these facts, considering the urgent insistence of the head of the Department of Commerce and Labor, would it be wise to now discontinue this service? You have the facts as best I can state them before you. Of course, if the result accomplished does not commend itself to the Congress, you can strike out the item. As I have stated to you, it did not commend itself very seriously to me, but the gentleman at the head of the Department earnestly favors it and many manufacturers and merchants of our country earnestly support this proposition. I thought they were entitled to have these facts before you when you act on the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think that inasmuch as the manufacturers have plenty of money to employ their own drummers, and do so, that Congress should also provide for them and deny our people river and harbor improvements and rural delivery?

Mr. LITTAUER. Who gives employment to the people?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you not create more jobs in this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. Jobs!

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you not create a whole lot—a hundred or a thousand more jobs? Why don't you give everybody a job? I have 350,000 people in my district who would like a job. Just drive up a Jersey cow to every man's front door twice a day. Drive them up and give them their feed—feed and maintain every person—thus do something for the people of the United States, instead of doing it all for the manufacturers.

Mr. LITTAUER. I move that all debate upon this paragraph and amendments close in five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate upon the paragraph and all amendments be closed in five minutes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Upon what basis am I recognized, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes on his motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. I am as much in favor of doing everything which the Government properly can do to promote foreign trade as any man in the United States; and if we did not have an adequate representation of our commercial interests abroad in our consuls, I would favor not only the $30,000 which this committee has recommended for expenditures in the employment of these traveling agents, but the $100,000 which the head of the Bureau says he should have for that work. But, Mr. Chairman, I read these bulletins, I will say to my friend from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. So do I.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Nearly every morning, not from end to end, but I look to see if there is anything of interest, and frequently read them altogether, and my experience confirms the statement made here that it is a duplication of work, and in that respect an unnecessary expenditure of the public treasure.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, my recollection is that the gentleman from Texas the other day, when the consular bill was up, said that some of the consuls were not competent, efficient men.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I stated at that time that the consular service was not bad generally, but that in some instances there were men in the service who ought to be out of it; and when a change of Administration comes, which we think there will, they will all be changed.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether he believes our consuls to-day receive adequate salaries, either, for traveling around about the country in which they are stationed to such an extent as to present to the manufacturers of this country in their line any proper statement as to the conditions throughout the country to which they are appointed? The Secretary of Commerce and Labor on that very point has spoken in this way; and as I believe you desire to have all the facts, I would like to infringe upon your time while I read this statement. He said:

> I do not think that the consular service as now constituted can handle this subject at the present time. In the first place, our consuls are not paid an adequate salary. They have to perform clerical service. There is no fund with which to enable them to make independent investigations. I have a letter here, a portion of which I would like to read, on this subject. To my mind it is a very interesting letter, and it was written to me by Mr. R. J. Gross, second vice president of the American Locomotive Company, of Dunkirk, N. Y., taking up the subject of our consuls, and so on. [Reads:]
> "Relative to the commercial reports required by our Government from our consuls, complaints were made by some of those I met that in the effort to make these reports of greater value to our manufacturers, they were placed at a great disadvantage by the restrictive character of the Government regulations. In order to obtain full and reliable information on any given subject it is often necessary to make a personal investigation."

Mr. SLAYDEN. I wish to say in reply, I think the consulates have been so placed that they do not very fairly cover commercial requirements. If I have any more time left I yield it to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the provision should be stricken from this bill myself. When this provision went into the bill last year it did not commend itself to me. There were propositions at that time to provide agents in the Department of Commerce and Labor and agents under the Secretary of State. In the consular-reform bill, which I believe has just been agreed to by Congress, there is a provision for consular agents under the Department of State. Very likely that was not called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations. But, if it had been, I think they would have been justified in putting this provision in the bill. The Department of Commerce and Labor was created partly for the purpose of aiding in the development of commerce. It will not do in this country to say, as suggested by my distinguished friend from Tennessee, that the Government shall give no aid to commerce, and that this whole work shall be left to the private interests. Why, Mr. Chairman, we devote large sums of money for the benefit of the rural constituents of our Members of Congress, and for the country, and I believe it is right to do so. We spend enormous sums of money for the development of the mining interests of this country, but up to the present time we have spent but little for the development of the commerce of the country. Now, everyone knows that the United States produces the cotton crop of the world; everyone knows that we have electric power and cheap coal power throughout the country going to waste to-day; everyone knows that the United States ought to be manufacturing and shipping abroad the cotton products of the world.

We can do so in South America; we can do so in China; we can do so in Japan; we can do so in Africa, if we develop the opportunities which present themselves before us. This is not mere consular work. The consul at any particular place can only review the conditions at that place. He can not understand the conditions over an empire or over an entire locality of country; but these agents, who travel from place to place, will learn the conditions in South America, will learn the conditions in China or Japan, and will present to the manufacturers and producers of this country information under which we will add to our foreign commerce many-fold. We have added to the agricultural products of the country many-fold through the Agricultural Department. We ought to add to our foreign commerce many-fold through the operations of the Department of Commerce and Labor. Here is a paltry sum of $30,000, for what? To obtain information which only a Government agent can obtain, which no private representative of a commercial body can obtain—to obtain information through a Government agency, information which is open only to him.

Mr. PALMER. Other countries spend money for this same class of work, do they not?

Mr. LITTAUER. Enormous sums.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. How can we expect to compete with these other countries commercially if we do not make use of the same agencies which they find so efficient?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is right. Germany during the last four or five years has increased its foreign commerce in greater proportion than any nation in the world has ever done in the history of time, and she has done that through the aid of these commercial agents in foreign countries, who tell her people at home what is needed abroad, what can be sold abroad, and how to gain trade.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And she is getting the trade, too.

Mr. MANN. To a very large extent. We want our share of that trade. This provision is as important to the commerce and manufactures and industries of the country as is the Department of Agriculture to the agriculture of the country, and I can not pay it a higher compliment than by saying that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know—I mean has he official information showing that Germany pays out of her treasury for these commercial agents?

Mr. MANN. I have that information, Mr. Chairman. I investigated that matter at the time the Department of Commerce and Labor was created. Germany was then expending large sums of money with her foreign commercial agents, some of whom were in this country.

Mr. LITTAUER. She spends at least a million marks.

Mr. MANN. When they come, sources of information are opened to them out of national comity, which would not be open to any private agency.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are these gentlemen consuls?

Mr. MANN. They are not consuls; they are commercial agents. They are sometimes called "commercial attachés" when they are directly connected with the consular service, but some of them are not connected with the consular service at all and are simply commercial agents.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And they are paid for out of the Government funds?

Mr. MANN. They are paid for out of Government funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation and per diem, to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, of special attorneys, special examiners, and special agents, for the purpose of carrying on the work of said Bureau, as provided by the act approved February 14, 1903, entitled "An act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor," the per diem to be, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $4 per day to each of said special attorneys, special examiners, and special agents, and also of other officers and employees in the Bureau of Corporations while absent from their homes on duty outside of the District of Columbia and for their actual necessary traveling expenses, including necessary sleeping-car fares; in all, $125,000.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The two paragraphs which have just been read in the pending appropriation bill cover the items for the Bureau of Corporations. The Bureau of Corporations was created at the time the Department of Commerce and Labor was created, for the purpose largely of investigating the great combinations of the country, usually called "the trusts." One of the greatest of these is the Standard Oil Company and its various offspring.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy a few minutes of the time of the House in discussing some phases of the political activity of the Standard Oil Company, in the course of which I wish to insert some statements taken from newspapers, all of which I do not desire to read, but only enough to show their character, and for that purpose I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I notice that my young friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has on several occasions manifested a decided curiosity concerning the affairs of the Standard Oil Company. He introduced the resolution in accordance with which the Bureau of Corporations has for some time past been investigating the methods of that company. He has proposed other measures hitting at the illegal practices and the unconscionable means adopted by that company to force railroad companies on their knees to it and to force independent dealers in oil out of business. Other members of Congress have proposed other measures aimed at monopoly in other quarters. It might seem apparent from recent proceedings in Congress and elsewhere in public that the people were having their innings and that the powerful combinations of capital were on the run.

STANDARD OIL WILL FIGHT.

I want, however, to warn my friend from Kansas that he will not do all the fighting and make all the moves. The Standard Oil crowd may seem perfectly quiet, but he will find out that Standard Oil can fight back. It is well to always be prepared for battle when you are engaged in war. Standard Oil has become the most powerful financial organization or group in the country. It will not tamely submit to continual attack. It never has fought in the open. It succeeded in the past by secret methods. It will not be ostensibly known in political fights, but I have recently discovered that it does not forget and does not forgive. And I am led to briefly tell the House some little experience of my own in order that gentlemen may be warned in advance.

BILLS OPPOSED BY STANDARD OIL.

Mr. Chairman, three bills have passed this House in the last few years which the Standard Oil Company has bitterly opposed. These bills were, first, creating the Bureau of Corporations in the Department of Commerce and Labor; second, prohibiting the payment of rebates in any form by railways; third, regulating railway rates. The first two became laws; the latter is now pending in the Senate. It has so happened that I have been somewhat prominent in the House in connection with all of them.

CREATION OF BUREAU OF CORPORATIONS TO INVESTIGATE STANDARD OIL.

On January 6, 1903, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I reported to the House the bill establishing the new Department of Commerce and Labor. That bill had originated in the Senate, which passed it on January 28, 1902. On December 19, 1902, I introduced in the House the bill (H. R. 16282) to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor. The bill, which was reported to the House on January 6, 1903, was nominally the Senate bill, but it was reported with a recommendation that all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause be stricken out and that there be inserted as a substitute the language of the bill which I had introduced December 19. One of the provisions of that bill was a section creating a Bureau of Corporations, in the following language:

That there shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be called the Bureau of Corporations, and the chief of said Bureau shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. There shall also be in said Bureau such clerks and assistants as may from time to time be authorized by law. It shall be the province and duty of said Bureau, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning such corporations doing business within the limits of the United States as shall engage in interstate commerce or in commerce between the United States and any foreign country, and to attend to such other duties as may be hereafter provided by law.

IMPORTANCE OF BILL IN CONFERENCE.

On January 19, 1903, the House passed the substitute bill, and the bill was returned to the Senate. The Senate in formal manner disagreed to the action of the House and asked for a conference between the House and the Senate. That was agreed to by the House, and the Senate named as the conferees Senators Hanna, NELSON, and CLAY. The House named the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], and myself.

The provision for a bureau of corporations which I had drafted was, I believe, the first proposition in any bill for a bureau of the Government which should gather, compile, publish, and supply useful information concerning corporations, and it was intended to be the first step toward controlling and regulating the great combinations of capital ordinarily termed "trusts." There had been much talk and many bills upon the subject, but here was a definite proposition to put a Department of the Government at work on the question.

When the bill passed the House with this provision in it and was sent to conference, it was at once recognized as a matter of tremendous importance. In legislative procedure a bill in conference occupies a commanding strategic position. A conference report is in order at any time. It can not be sidetracked. It must be considered. The only persons who can prevent consideration are the conferees themselves, who may refuse to report.

The House had inserted the provision for the Bureau of Corporations and the Senate had disagreed to all amendments to the bill before it went to conference, so that this particular provision was opened to amendment in any form.

INTEREST OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

All at once, in the midst of the cloud of legislative procedure, delays, juggling, and opposition, there appeared this golden opportunity to put upon the statute books a provision giving to a Government official authority to investigate fully the business methods adopted by the great corporations. At conferences between members of the House and Senate, and which extended to President Roosevelt, it was determined to make the effort to strengthen the provision creating the Bureau of Corporations. A new provision was drafted, which became known as the "Nelson amendment." This was intended as an additional provision to the section as I had originally drafted it.

The President had earnestly recommended legislation which might be used to curb the tremendous power and influence of the great combinations of capital, and he was very anxious that some legislation be enacted at that session of Congress.

TWO ADMINISTRATION MEASURES.

Out of the agitation and consideration of the subject it became suddenly the policy of President Roosevelt and the friends of his Administration in Congress to secure the enactment into law of two propositions at that session.

First. The section providing for a Bureau of Corporations as modified by the Nelson amendment.

Second. A bill forbidding railway rebates and extending the power of the courts by injunction to prevent railway preferences. A bill along these lines was prepared as a Roosevelt Administration measure, was introduced in the Senate by Senator Elkins, became known as the "Elkins antirebate bill," was passed by the Senate on February 3, 1903, sent over to the House and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Members of that committee, including myself, were at once interviewed in reference to the bill, and it was stated publicly that the Elkins bill would likely be reported back to the House favorably, and be passed.

SITUATION FEBRUARY 7, 1903.

So that on February 6 and 7, 1903, the situation was like this: The Department of Commerce bill, carrying the Bureau of Corporations for the purpose of investigating the corporate trusts, was in conference, with a proposition to enlarge the powers of the proposed Commissioner of Corporations, and the Elkins antirebate bill had passed the Senate and was pending in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, with likelihood of favorable action.

PANIC OF STANDARD OIL CROWD.

Then seemed a prospect of actual legislation. Here seemed a chance that the House and the Senate would agree upon measures to be enacted into law which would not only probe the methods employed by the Standard Oil Company and some other trusts, but would take away from the Standard Oil Company the means by which it had fattened for years, the collection of rebates from the railways. Here, in the opinion of the Standard Oil crowd, was danger. They were alarmed. They suddenly awakened to the fact that the men in charge of legislation in Congress had gotten beyond the point of talk and were ready to do things. The Standard Oil crowd became panic-stricken. They hastened to do what they could to head off the proposed legislation. They adopted every known means to prevent the proposed action. I shall not attempt to describe in my own language what they did. I might be considered a biased witness in that regard, but I beg to remind you what some of the most noted and able newspaper correspondents in the country wrote at that time.

On the morning of February 8, 1903, the Washington Post, a great newspaper, and then an Administration paper, had this to say:

It can be stated by authority that unless antitrust legislation at least reasonably satisfactory to the Administration is enacted at the present session President Roosevelt, on the 5th of March, will call an extraordinary session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. The President himself has told Members of Congress of his desire and of his determination in this regard. It is understood that the announcement was direct and unqualified.

It is further stated that the determination of the President was reached only after careful consideration of the strenuous efforts that are being made to defeat any antitrust legislation by Congress. These efforts have covered a wide range. They were characterized yesterday by one prominent Republican leader, to quote him directly, "as the most remarkable of which I have had personal knowledge during my public life."

These efforts culminated during the past thirty-six hours. It is now declared, in direct appeal from the Standard Oil Company, through its president, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, to members of the Senate not to enact any antitrust legislation at this time. No less than six United States Senators have received telegrams signed "John D. Rockefeller," urging that no antitrust legislation be enacted. It has not been possible to obtain a copy of these despatches, which, it can be said, are practically identical. Substantially they read as follows:

[Telegram.—From Standard Oil Interests.]

"We are opposed to any antitrust legislation. Our counsel, Mr. ——, will see you. It must be stopped."

As stated, these telegrams (and it must be clear that only the substance, and not the exact wording, is here given) were signed "John D. Rockefeller." Friday morning one of the counsel of the Standard Oil Company arrived in Washington and called immediately upon the members of the Senate, as indicated in the telegrams.

Last night the efforts being made to defeat or emasculate pending antitrust legislation formed the basis of some animated conferences. Indeed, the subject is likely to be developed in some detail in Congress.

On the morning of February 8 William E. Curtis made the following statement in the Chicago Record-Herald:

* * * This morning several gentleman appeared in Washington and several letters and telegrams were received urgently urging the emasculation of the antitrust measures which have originated at the White House and have been crowded upon the attention of Congress with so much energy by President Roosevelt. * * *

At least five of the most prominent and influential Senators on the Republican side, and perhaps more that I have not heard of, received long telegrams signed "John D. Rockefeller," requesting them to give their earnest consideration to the suggestions of his attorneys, and begging that no legislation whatever be enacted concerning the trusts.

And on February 9 Walter Wellman made the following statement in the Chicago Record-Herald:

With one blow straight from the shoulder President Roosevelt knocked out the Standard Oil Company. It was the President who gave to the public the news that representatives of the oil monopoly had been in Washington trying to defeat all antitrust legislation, and that telegrams had been received by Senators signed "John D. Rockefeller," urging that the antitrust act now pending be either emasculated or killed. * * *

On the morning of February 10 Mr. William E. Curtis made this statement in the Chicago Record-Herald:

* * * There is also a great deal of mystery about the telegrams which were received on Friday from Mr. Rockefeller by six different Senators, said to be Aldrich, Hanna, PLATT of New York, KNOX, LODGE, and FORAKER. A desperate effort is being made to convince people that they were forgeries and were intended to prejudice Congress against the trusts, but, unfortunately, whoever sent them was aware that the regular attorneys of the Standard Oil Company were on their way to Washington and notified the persons to whom they were addressed that those gentlemen would explain the objections to the publicity amendment. The attorneys appeared as announced, called upon several Senators, and made known the objections of Mr. Rockefeller to that part of the Nelson amendment which authorizes the proposed Commissioner of Corporations to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers.

On the afternoon of February 9 the Chicago Daily News printed a dispatch from its staff correspondent in Washington, in which the following statement was made:

Members of the conference committee who favored the trust legislation feared the influence of the Standard Oil Company, and they brought their deliberations to a speedy close. The committee had been deadlocked by a disagreement between the House and Senate members over the inclusion of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the new Department. When the news of young Mr. Rockefeller's telegrams reached the committee rooms, the House members decided to accept the terms of the Senate conferees and permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to continue as an independent bureau rather than delay an agreement on the Nelson amendment until after the Senate has been mainly influenced by Mr. Rockefeller's telegrams.

President Roosevelt, however, has sufficient faith in the story to send out from the White House a semiofficial announcement that should Congress fail to pass satisfactory trust legislation he would call an extra session of Congress for that purpose. This action has already had its effect. The Elkins antirebate bill, which was expected to die in the House as a result of Speaker Henderson's antagonism, will be taken up by the Interstate Commerce Committee and doubtless will be reported favorably, notwithstanding those who have studied this bill have also disappeared. The report of the conferees undoubtedly will be adopted.

CONFERENCE REPORT AGREED TO.

Dispatches of the same character were sent to all parts of the country. In legislative circles in Washington there was a lively buzz. Attorneys of the Standard Oil Company were thick in Washington. Lobbyists of all degrees and characters seemed at once to have new life put into them and possibly new resources furnished them.

On February 9 the three conferees on the part of the House on the Department of Commerce and Labor bill presented to the House the conference report. This conference report was agreed to in the House on February 10, and agreed to in the Senate on the next day.

As stated, the conference report was agreed to by the House on February 10, 1903. On February 12, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I reported back to the House the Elkins antirebate bill, with some amendments, recommending that the bill be passed. On February 13 the bill was passed by the House on a roll call with only 6 votes against to 250 for it, the amendments were agreed to by the Senate on the 14th, the bill was approved by the President on February 19, and became a law.

IT HAPPENED.

Mr. Chairman, in the passage of this legislation through Congress, various things happened which connected me with it in a somewhat marked degree.

It happened that I was the author of the section creating a Bureau of Corporations. It happened that I was directed by the House committee to write the report in favor of the passage of the Department of Commerce and Labor bill and to champion that bill on the floor of the House. It happened that I was one of the House conferees when that bill was in conference between the House and the Senate. It happened that I was directed by the House committee to write the report on the antirebate bill recommending its passage. It happened that these two bills were aimed at practices largely indulged in by the Standard Oil crowd, as the public believes. It happened that these two bills met the violent opposition of the Standard Oil crowd. It so happened that, although I was a very humble instrument of the House in connection with the passage of these laws, I incurred the violent displeasure of the Standard Oil crowd.

THE PEOPLE SOMETIMES FORGET THEIR FRIENDS, BUT STANDARD OIL NEVER FORGETS ITS ENEMIES.

At that time every possible effort was made by the Standard Oil crowd to bully the President and to bluff Congress. The men who constitute that little coterie seemed to forget ordinary prudence and openly and unblushingly dared to intimate that they could control the action of the greatest legislative body in the world. They were not able to move President Roosevelt from his determined resolution and honest purposes, nor were they able to influence in the slightest degree the action of the conference committee or the course of the legislation. With expressions of bitter hatred and with threats of vengeance, their attorneys and representatives left Washington.

Mr. Chairman, during those crucial days I was reminded that "the people sometimes forget their friends, but Standard Oil never forgets its foes."

I have reason to believe that there is truth in the latter part of the statement. I was told at that time that Standard Oil and its various connections exerted a strong influence in my Congressional district.

RAILWAY REBATES TO STANDARD OIL.

The influence which Standard Oil thinks it can exert, the various influences which it thinks it can control, the power it thinks it can wield are illustrated by some recent events.

During the past season the Bureau of Corporations has been investigating the methods of the Standard Oil crowd, and the officials of that Bureau were told in almost plain language that the Standard Oil crowd would not permit such an investigation to go on.

Hear what Raymond said in the Chicago Daily Tribune on December 28, 1905:

> At the outset of the investigation into the operations of the Standard Oil Company, now nearly concluded by the United States Government, there was discovered, of course, an intimate relationship between the production and transportation both of the crude and finished product. The Standard Oil Company could not live a day in opposition to any independent concern which would spring up, if it were not for its practical control of the transportation business.
> This is the fact which was first brought to the attention of the Government agents, and they have been led to see that an attack on the Standard Oil Company can not hope for success unless, at the same time, almost every railroad line in the country is brought to book and made to see that a rebate to the Rockefeller combination is just as illegal as a cut rate to the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company or any other corporation.
> I have been informed that the investigations of the Department of Commerce and Labor have led in the direction of uncovering a gigantic system of railroad rebates which has been built up in almost every city of the United States. * * *

IMPUDENCE OF STANDARD OIL.

Raymond also said, in the Chicago Daily Tribune on December 29, 1905, the following:

> "We are bigger than the Government. Standard Oil is stronger than the United States. We own the Senate and the House. If you pursue your investigations beyond the point necessary to fool the public we will have you removed. We can secure the instant deposition of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Mr. Metcalf, and the Commissioner of Corporations, Mr. Garfield. If you persecute us in the slightest degree you will be out of your job, and if you keep at the business you will find out that what we say is absolutely true."
> This is the kind of talk which has been handed out to the agents of the Government at every stage of the game. The first thing they learned was that the Standard Oil Company, as has been truly said of it, was a great "system." They discovered, as I have said before, that the investigation of the beef trust was merely child's play as compared with an inquiry into the operations of the Standard Oil Company.

EXTRAORDINARY SECRET MACHINERY.

> Agents of the Government were confronted at the outset by evidences of the existence of extraordinary secret machinery of the Standard Oil Company. They discovered that it covers the United States and probably extends into foreign countries. It was organized and operated in the first place for the express purpose of preventing jobbers and peddlers from cutting prices. Contracts exist between the Standard Oil Company and various subsidiary companies and private firms for the disposal of the product of the united corporation.

> This secret service is said to be more complete, more unscrupulous, and more far-reaching than anything which has ever been known before in this country. Government agents have been aghast at its extent. For a while they were stupified and frightened by its threats. Occasionally they ran across a big man, and he talked in such an alarming fashion that it became necessary to refer the substance of the conversation to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and even to the President himself. At every stage of the investigation the agents of the Government have been thwarted by the malign influence of people who are not supposed to be associated with the Standard Oil Company, but who are none the less ready to do its bidding.

TO THROTTLE THE LAW.

> At the outset it was discovered that this extraordinary secret service of the Standard Oil Company, which permeated every city and State, was in the beginning organized for the sole purpose of preventing dangerous competition. Later on it was diverted to other directions, and the agents of the Government realized that they were up against a system which, although organized to prevent the cutting of rates, could be used to stifle evidence, to pack juries, to corrupt minor officials, to divert public sentiment, and ultimately to prevent criminal prosecution.
> This system of spies and informers appears to have been organized on a definite basis. It is the same in every locality which shows the existence of a central head. Furthermore, it has been developed by the investigation of Government experts that these secret-service men are shifted from one part of the country to another, so as to render them absolutely independent of local influences.

> In the first place, it has been shown that the Standard Oil Company is the parent of a secret service which is far and away better and bigger than the secret machinery of the United States Government.

THE MILEAGE AMENDMENT.

One of the reasons now offered for my defeat is that last year, when presiding over the House as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, I ruled that it was in order, by appropriation in the general deficiency bill, to make available the sum of $190,000 for the payment of mileage of Members of Congress attending the regular session of Congress, beginning on the first Monday of December, 1903. It is said that I ought to have declared out of order an amendment proposing this mileage appropriation. In making the ruling I followed the parliamentary precedents of the House. For two days, on a former occasion, the same question had been argued on a point of order in the House before a distinguished parliamentarian then in the chair, and a decision was then rendered which was expected to be and was a guide for future decisions in the House. I followed that previous decision of the Chair as a guiding precedent. In addition to that decision and to other decisions of similar import, I did not then and I do not now have any doubt as to the correctness of the ruling as a parliamentary proposition. I think those who denounce me for my ruling forget that it is as much the duty of the person who is presiding over the House of Representatives to render his decisions in accordance with the law and the precedents as it is the duty of the honest judge of a court. The House of Representatives can not be presided over on the basis of a partisan chairman of a factional convention. I made the same sort of a decision which would have been made by any experienced Chairman, and I would have received and deserved the contempt of the parliamentarians in the House if I had ruled other than as I did.

The proposition which was presented was not, as most people seem to think, one to pay mileage to members of Congress. It was in substance a proposition to make available for the payment of mileage a certain sum of money. Before any member of Congress could have drawn his mileage he must have presented his account or statement to the Committee on Mileage for its approval. His account must have been certified to be correct by the Speaker of the House. The legality of the account must also have passed by the scrutiny of the Auditor and the Comptroller of the Treasury, the two accounting officers who determine whether expenditures are authorized by law or not.

Some of my Standard Oil friends are saying that as chairman I ought not to have ruled in order any item a part of which might subsequently come to me. The compensation of a Member of Congress, though provided by law, can not be paid to him unless appropriated by Congress. Mileage can never be paid unless an appropriation be first made by Congress. It is hence inevitable that a Member of Congress must every year be called upon to vote whether he will appropriate the money necessary for the payment of his salary, including mileage. This does not mean that he votes to pay himself any sum. He simply votes to make available that sum for the payment of something provided by law. Whether it is in fact provided for by law, so that he shall receive the money, depends upon the decision of the accounting officers of the Government. There is no other way of providing the money out of which the mileage or other compensation of Members of Congress shall be paid.

I voted for the appropriation of mileage, because I felt that the existing law provided for it. I have long been convinced that the best method of preventing "graft" in public places is to provide for public officials reasonable compensation for their services, and then to pay it to them.

I do not propose to go into a discussion of that subject at this time. I do not need to justify myself here. There is not a single Member of the House who believes that I would have stultified the record I have endeavored to make during the years while here by voting to myself as mileage the sum of $300. It is almost too silly to be mentioned here, but I shall have more to say out in my own district to my constituents, who have been told a number of things on this subject which are not so.

But whether I was right or wrong when I voted to appropriate a sufficient sum to pay mileage to those who were entitled to it under the law, I did it in the open, in the limelight, honestly and above board. I did not sneak around the corner to get a rebate. I did not attempt to crush a rival. I took my position as an honest man with an honest belief and dared to vote the way I thought.

It might well lie in the mouths of some men to criticise me for this action, on the ground not of dishonesty, but on the ground of belief in a wrong policy. But for the Standard Oil crowd and their representatives to hold up their hands in holy horror because of my honest vote on this occasion is enough to excite the derisive laughter of the solid rocks themselves.

THE ELKINS LAW HATED BY STANDARD OIL.

But if this argument against me, urged by Standard Oil, is ludicrous, what shall be said of the other argument which it urges? I am denounced because I reported into the House and urged the passage of the Elkins antirebate act. That act was aimed more at Standard Oil than anyone else. It hurt the Standard Oil crowd more than it did anybody else. Good judgment on their part would have caused them not to mention where the sore spot was, but their candidate can not resist their feeling of bitterness because of my activity to prevent the payment to them of rebates.

The Elkins antirebate act was distinctly an Administration measure, considered and urged by the Roosevelt Administration. It met with the approval of both Houses of Congress, notwithstanding the bitter enmity of the Standard Oil crowd. But Standard Oil in my district now is urging as one of the reasons for defeating me my part in connection with its passage through the House. No wonder. That law has stopped the payment of rebates to the Standard Oil companies. It has lost them millions. It hurts. They feel it. They hate it. They hate me for that.

Probably an additional reason which will be soon urged against me is the fact that I have been somewhat connected with the railroad rate bill, which recently passed the House. The Elkins antirebate law, the railroad rate bill when it is enacted into law, and the Bureau of Corporations in the Department of Commerce and Labor are likely to put out of business the practical monopoly so long enjoyed by the Standard Oil Company and its various offspring corporations in the handling of crude and refined oil in this country.

UNIVERSITY NOT TO BLAME.

It does not seem unnatural that they desire to make an example of me in the district where they claim, I believe falsely, to have such power. There are some members of the Standard Oil crowd who impudently think that when a donation has been made to the University of Chicago the gift binds to their interest both the bodies and the souls of the students and professors of the University of Chicago.

But the university in my district is founded upon grounds too broad; its chairs are filled by men too eminent; its halls are attended by students too earnest to be intentionally controlled and wielded and molded by any sordid, corrupt, or dishonest influences of the Standard Oil crowd.

I defend the integrity of the university against such an unjust imputation. I do not believe that Mr. John D. Rockefeller, who has contributed so liberally to the university, would himself be a party to, or in any way countenance, this present scheme of the secret service of Standard Oil. Whatever may be the outcome, I shall continue to believe that the position and conduct of persons, connected with the university on all political questions, are controlled from honest and patriotic motives in the spirit of intellectual freedom.

I expect to suffer personal abuse; I expect to be the object of slanderous statements; I expect the secret service of Standard Oil to accuse me of many kinds of dishonesty and to denounce me for many forms of corruption. I expect honest men to be misled into bearing false witness against me. Standard Oil has never hesitated at any means to accomplish the result desired. Many a good man and many a thriving business has been crushed by its methods.

The people of my district intend to do right. They want to be true to good government. They will decide according to their light in favor of what they think is the right. If, perchance, they should be misled by the superior cunning and the powerful secret service of Standard Oil into believing that I have been false to the trust which they reposed in me, I shall not indulge in any words of harsh criticism, but will remember that though evil and falsehood seem to gain a firm footing at times and to be temporarily successful, in the long run "truth is mighty and will prevail."

Mr. Chairman, in my public career I have never trimmed my sails to the passing breeze. I am not much of a politician and I fear usually not very politic. I often tread upon toes which possibly I might well avoid. I have never learned the art of doing a thing because it would be popular, or failing to do it because it would arouse the enmity of the powerful. I have never attempted to be the agent of special interests, either to prevent or to forward legislation. I have only known one sure guide, and that is, never to be hasty in forming judgment, but when one's own judgment is conscientiously formed, never be afraid to act upon it. Every man makes many mistakes, but I made no mistake three years ago when I did what little I could toward placing upon the statute books those provisions which prevent railway corporations giving preferences to the mighty as against the weak, building up the large and powerful dealers as against the poorer and weaker ones, and giving to a bureau of the Government authority to dig deep into the methods by which unscrupulous men have made themselves fabulously wealthy at the expense of their rivals in business and at the cost of the American public. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the people in my district will do, nor do I care much. They can not take away from me my own knowledge that I endeavored to do right, nor can they remove from me my own self-respect. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Manufactures: Chief of Bureau of Manufactures, $4,000; assistant chief of Bureau, $2,500; chief of division, $2,100; two clerks of class 4; clerk of class 2; four clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk, at $900; three assistant messengers; two laborers; in all, $24,780.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of line 3, page 146, the words "two thousand five hundred" and insert the words "three thousand." The purpose of this would be to increase the salary or compensation of the assistant chief of the Bureau of Manufactures from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. DALZELL. It is not subject to a point of order, is it?

Mr. MANN. I think it is. That item was carried in the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Suppose it is. If the paragraph has been removed from the operation of the rule that makes it subject to a point of order, this amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. The item itself is not subject to a point of order because it is carried on the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Then the amendment is not subject to a point of order. I think the Chair will find that that has been so ruled. If the House sees fit to consider a paragraph which would be subject to a point of order, if it takes it out from under the point of order, waives the point of order, then it certainly must allow that paragraph to be amended to suit the wishes of the House.

Mr. MANN. No doubt the gentleman is right about that. The only question is whether the paragraph is subject to a point of order. I do not think it is.

Mr. DALZELL. I thought the gentleman reserved a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DALZELL. If the paragraph is not subject to a point of order the amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the paragraph is not subject to a point of order the amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there was any provision of law fixing the salary of this officer?

Mr. MANN. I think there is.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is a new office. The salary of the office was fixed in the urgent deficiency bill, which has passed the House.

Mr. DALZELL. But that is not a statutory provision?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is merely a provision on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, that would go a long way. The law creating the Bureau of Commerce and Labor provided for such clerks as should thereafter be provided by Congress. We have covered this in an urgent deficiency bill, which passed the House in January.

Mr. DALZELL. But the gentleman does not contend that the provision in an urgent deficiency bill is such a provision of law as fixes the salary of this officer?

Mr. MANN. It did fix the salary in the deficiency bill.

Mr. DALZELL. It provided for a deficiency.

Mr. MANN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. It was a deficiency in one sense; it created the office. There was no deficiency.

Mr. DALZELL. Suppose we concede that. It is a provision for the current year, but not such a provision of law as would subject this to a point of order. If it were subject to a point of order it has been waived by the rule of the House, and then it is open to amendment without regard to the point of order, because the House has a right to dispose of it without regard to the provision in the bill.

Mr. MANN. That would be a very serious ruling if it should be adopted.

Mr. DALZELL. I think it has been so ruled.

Mr. MANN. The law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor——

Mr. LITTAUER. Did not provide for this office.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it did or not.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would call the attention of the committee to the provision in this bill which would have been subject to a point of order had we not adopted the resolution which we have adopted.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, for the sake of information, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Your proposition is, because the rule waives the point of order as to the paragraph, therefore no point of order will lie to the amendment?

Mr. DALZELL. That is my point.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to have the Chair rule on that.

Mr. DALZELL. I think the Chair will find that where a bill subject to a point of order has been sent to the Committee of the Whole without any points of order reserved, it has been held that the bill is open to germane amendments without regard to points of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. All points of order were reserved on this bill.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think the law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor contained a provision, as it does in most cases, that there shall be such other officers as may hereafter be provided by Congress. Now, Congress has provided for this office in the urgent deficiency bill, and hence it would not have been subject to a point of order on the ground that it was not provided for by law, because it was provided for by law in the urgent deficiency bill by Congress in the manner contemplated in the act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I can not lay my hand exactly on the ruling, but I am satisfied that it has been so ruled, and I have so ruled myself twice when in the chair. I await the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to understand the facts a little more fully. Is it conceded that this office of assistant chief of Bureau, at $2,500, is created by this paragraph?

Mr. LITTAUER. No, Mr. Chairman; it was created in the urgent deficiency bill of this year, wherein there was a paragraph reading as follows:

Bureau of Manufactures: For assistant chief of Bureau, to be selected and appointed by the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, at the rate of $2,500 per annum during the balance of the fiscal year 1906, $1,142, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

That is the first recognition in legislation of this office. The organization of the Bureau simply calls for the chief of Bureau, together with a general provision for clerical assistance.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be pardoned, this is a rather important matter, so far as the ruling is concerned. The act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor provides in section 5 that there shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be called the "Bureau of Manufactures," and a chief of said Bureau, etc., and that there shall also be in said Bureau such clerical assistants as may from time to time be authorized by Congress.

Now, it seems to me that under that provision of the law Congress reserved to itself in the act the right to provide for the offices in an appropriation bill, and having provided for this office in the urgent deficiency bill that item is in order, irrespective of the special rule, because it is an assistant provided by Congress. Under the original act, if the original item is in order, then a proposition to increase the salary beyond the one already provided for, it seems to me, is subject to the point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. Surely, if it was in order in the deficiency bill, it is in order in this bill. The gentleman's proposition is that the appropriation of a particular salary in the deficiency bill (which was in order) for the current year is the permanent fixing of the salary of the officer, which certainly can not be true.

Mr. MANN. Whether it was in order in the deficiency bill or not cuts no figure. In the deficiency bill Congress provided for the office, as was contemplated by the original act.

Mr. DALZELL. And therefore the committee now has the right to provide for the salary.

Mr. MANN. But the salary was provided for at the time the office was provided for.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, for the current year; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It appears that section 5 of the act of Congress approved February 14, 1903, creating this Department, provides that there shall be in it a chief of said Bureau who shall be appointed by the President and who shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum, and that there shall also be in said Bureau such clerical assistants as may from time to time be provided by Congress. The Chair, without stopping to look up the urgent deficiency bill passed at this session, is advised and understands it to be conceded that it does provide for this officer—names him and appropriates $2,500 as his compensation for the current year. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] proposes to appropriate $3,000 for the year covered by the pending bill and a point of order is made that the amendment changes existing law in violation of clause 2 of Rule XXI. It has been ruled repeatedly that where a paragraph which itself changes existing law is permitted to remain in a bill any germane amendment perfecting that paragraph is in order. If this were a new office, a new fixing of the salary without authority of law, or a change of law, the paragraph as it now stands would be in violation of that rule, but, as under the special rule adopted by the House yesterday it is permitted to remain in the bill, it would, in the opinion of the Chair, be subject to any germane amendment. But if this paragraph would not in any event have been subject to the point of order, if the salary is already fixed by law at $2,500, so that the paragraph in its present form does not offend against Rule XXI, then the amendment would not be in order, because it would be a change of existing law. The question therefore arises, Does the urgent deficiency bill recently passed and which is for the current year ending June 30, 1906, constitute existing law so as to fix the salary for subsequent years? Does it permanently establish the salary of this officer at $2,500? If so, this amendment is out of order. Now, it has been held repeatedly—so often that it is unnecessary for the Chair to refer to the decisions—that an appropriation bill for the current year does not afford an authority of law for a subsequent appropriation for a different period of time. Such an item in a general appropriation bill has over and over again been held to be law only for the year for which it appropriates. There has, however, been one exception made, as will appear by reference to the Manual, at page 355:

In the absence of a general law fixing a salary the amount appropriated in the last appropriation bill has been held to be the legal salary, although in violation of the general rule that the appropriation bill makes law only for the year.

The Chair desires the committee distinctly to bear in mind that it has been ruled over and over and over again that an appropriation for the current year is not existing law so as to authorize an appropriation for the same object for another year. The only exception to it is found in this ruling which was first made in the Fiftieth Congress, and has been on five or six occasions followed, with great reluctance, by those who have occupied the chair. The present occupant of the chair, if the question were a new one, would be very much inclined to hold that the position taken in the ruling just cited was not the correct one. If an appropriation for the current year for an office not previously created by law does not constitute law beyond the year as to the office, it is difficult to understand upon what principle an appropriation for the current year of a compensation not previously fixed by law can be held to constitute permanent law as to the salary. If it expires with the appropriation year as to an office, why not as a salary? The Chair, however, does not feel at liberty to override a ruling which has been followed several times, but proposes to submit to the committee the question——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it would be a very unfortunate thing to have a parliamentary proposition decided upon the merits of a man, and I therefore withdraw the point of order, the Chair having stated it the way I argued it.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent from the debate that has already been had here to-day that the committee regard the Bureau of Manufactures as one of the most important bureaus in the new Department of the Government.

Mr. MANN. What warrant has the gentleman for that statement? It has never done any work.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I was relying upon the debate which took place upon the paragraph with respect to the traveling expenses of special agents abroad, and I was going to follow it up by saying one of the most important functions of the Bureau of Manufactures was to see that the results of those investigations got promptly to the American people. I think they do get promptly to the American people through the medium of the journal which is published daily by the Department of Commerce and Labor. One of the most important functions of that Department is the publication of that journal, and the publication of that journal in an economical way requires a great deal of skill and special talent. I am told that when the present chief of the Bureau of Manufactures was appointed, Maj. John M. Carson, who is an old and experienced newspaper man, he devoted his entire time and attention to the editing of the reports of these special inspectors and our consuls abroad, and that the manner in which he did it, by reason of his skill as a newspaper man, saved to the Government some seven or eight hundred dollars a month in the way of printing. Now that duty devolves in the present instance upon the assistant to the chief, a gentleman who is eminently adapted to perform the duties of the place, who is an old newspaper man, a man familiar with trade relations, a man familiar with statistics, and a man who is able to edit in an economical way this great mass of information which comes into the Bureau from day to day.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was interested in your statement, but I failed to hear who the chief is.

Mr. DALZELL. The chief of the Bureau is Maj. John M. Carson.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He is the man whose salary you seek to increase?

Mr. DALZELL. No; I am seeking to increase the salary of the assistant.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. May I ask who fills the office of assistant?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Gibson, who was formerly on the editorial staff of the Philadelphia Press. I have no doubt gentlemen know him; he has been in Washington a great many years. Now, the assistant deputy commissioner of the Bureau of Corporations gets $3,500, which is more than I propose shall be given to the assistant in this Bureau, and it does seem to me that the services of a man competent to fill this place satisfactorily and with advantage to the public service can not be had for less than $3,000, and I trust the committee will see fit to advance the salary to that amount.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I can not agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Here is a position that is just four weeks old. We were asked a little over a month ago to provide an assistant to the chief of the Bureau of Manufactures, and did so. Let me call the fact to the committee's attention that when the Department of Commerce and Labor was created a Bureau of Manufactures was provided for. For a year or two the policy of what that Bureau should do was not settled upon and no provision was made, or such provision as was made for clerical assistance was detailed to other work. Last year we found that the chief of the Bureau was busying himself simply in writing a few letters around about, and we determined to drop the provision for the entire Bureau, when the Department called our attention to the fact that the consular reports, which at one time were a division in the State Department, had been transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor and placed in the Bureau of Statistics with the same force that formerly was employed in the work over in the State Department, and that they desired to have these reports edited by the Bureau of Manufactures. In the end it resulted that the State Department concluded that they could not dispense with the number of clerks transferred, so finally they received such accession to their own force. Thus it transpired that when we proposed to drop this entire Bureau of Manufactures there arose a real necessity for it, and we made provision for the current year for one chief and four clerical assistants. Now, what has this chief done? He has taken over the work of editing the consular reports, just that and nothing more, and I believe he has done the work in a much more satisfactory manner than it was formerly performed; but the same old consular force still exists, and we now propose to transfer it where the work is actually done—in the Bureau of Manufactures.

To-day all the force in that Bureau is nine men, under the Chief of the Bureau of Manufactures, with a salary of $4,000. He came before us and pleaded hard that he was an overworked man; he was editing these reports and finding that they were needed all through the country. I stated a few minutes ago in connection with the appropriation for traveling agents that I had never been deeply impressed with the results accomplished by that appropriation. Nevertheless, this editing is the way through which the information of these special agents is distributed broadcast through the country. This gentleman, so overworked, came before us and stated that he ought to have an assistant, and we gave him one. I want to refer to the fact that when the annual estimates came to us the submission was for a chief clerk, who would also be assistant, and be enabled to sign letters in the chief's absence, for which was estimated $2,000. It later developed that he wanted an assistant editor, and in the urgent deficiency bill, which passed four or five weeks ago, we provided for an assistant editor at $2,500. Now, I do not see why we should increase the salary of that assistant editor before he has really got settled down to his work, nor have I seen any recommendation that the clerk who wants to be chief clerk should have his salary increased.

Mr. DALZELL. Am I not right in assuming that the director or Cabinet officer at the head of this Department has recommended an increase in this salary?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; we have had no such recommendation.

Mr. DALZELL. I am so informed.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have nothing before us at all except the appropriation carried in the urgent deficiency bill for the balance of the current year. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations informs me that the chief wrote to him a letter requesting that this salary be raised.

Mr. DALZELL. I so understood.

Mr. LITTAUER. Bear in mind that the chief of this bureau was only appointed the 1st of last July. He has only six or seven months at the work, but he was overworked, and came to us a few weeks ago and we gave him an assistant at $2,500 a year. Let us see what this assistant can perform during the coming year. Let us see whether he will relieve the work so that the chief of the bureau can devote himself to other necessary matters.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did I understand the gentleman to say a few moments ago that there was a new chief clerk that was in charge?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; there is no chief clerk now.

Mr. SLAYDEN. He asked for a chief clerk or assistant?

Mr. LITTAUER. In the submission for this year in the Book of Estimates was an item for an assistant to the chief, who shall also act as chief clerk.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And subsequently you conceded it.

Mr. LITTAUER. No, no; we did not concede it. We conceded the appointment of this assistant to the chief, whose duty it is to edit these reports. We have now two editors, the chief editor and the assistant editor.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Who is really also the chief clerk?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; there are only seven clerks provided.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, I see that the necessity for the employment of this party is emphasized by what the gentleman has just said. This work has accumulated since the bureau has been established, and it has so accumulated that the head of the department has either to attend to that work alone and leave the rest unattended to or have somebody to take his place, so as to permit him to attend to the other duties for which the office was created. I still insist that it is out of the question to find a man of proper qualifications for such service as is required in that position at a salary less than the salary I suggest.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I must confess my profound astonishment at the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is one of the leaders on the other side; one of the most prominent men of his party, which is now in control of legislation, and hence chargeable with the duty and responsibility of conducting the affairs of the Government in an economical way. Yet, Mr. Chairman, we have the spectacle here of this leader of his party breaking all records in an effort to increase the salary of an employee who holds a position recently created, who would add to the salary of an officer whose place was created in the urgent deficiency bill passed here only a few weeks ago.

Mr. DALZELL. By $500.

Mr. BURLESON (continuing). Before this employee warms his seat; before he has discharged a single duty imposed upon him in the position he has been given; before he has so much as demonstrated that he has the efficiency to discharge these duties, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, one of the leaders of the dominant party, rushes to the rescue and offers this amendment to increase the salary of this newly appointed official. I will not charge that the gentleman from Pennsylvania does this because the person holding this office is from Philadelphia or Pennsylvania; I will not charge that it is because he is an old newspaper man; I will not say that he is prompted to this action because an affliction has been recently visited upon this man, which we all regret, which has impaired his usefulness as a newspaper man to such an extent that he is no longer employed as such, but I do assert that it is an unusual thing that a gentleman who is one of the foremost men of his party, and upon whom a weight of responsibility should rest, who should feel the responsibility of keeping down the expenses of the Government, has come here and now seeks in this extraordinary way to increase the expenses of the Government by increasing the salary of an employee who has hardly entered upon the discharge of his duty. I do sincerely hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will reconsider the matter and withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, of course I am very sorry to have astonished the gentleman from Texas. I made this suggestion neither because the gentleman was from Philadelphia nor from Pennsylvania nor for any other reason than that I believed that the adoption of the amendment would be in the interest of the public service, just as I suppose the gentleman from Texas believed that it would be in the interest of the public service when, a little while ago, he secured an amendment for an additional law clerk in the Land Office at $2,500 a year, who not only has not been long enough in that position to warm his feet, but who is not as yet in office. I suggest the amendment under full sense of my responsibility, and I shall vote for it in that way.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's information with reference to the value of the assistant chief of the Bureau of Manufactures is as erroneous as his information about the facts in connection with the creation of the position of chief law clerk in the Land Office, then, indeed, I insist that every gentleman here ought to vote against his amendment. As a matter of fact—and no one will dispute this statement—the man who is to occupy the place as chief law clerk has occupied a position in the Land Office since the Cleveland Administration, and the Department officials now propose to promote him to this new and more important position, as is shown in the hearings, because of his efficiency and his ability, and for no other reason. Now, what substantial reason has the gentleman from Pennsylvania given why we should vote for this increase advocated by him in the salary of this new, very new, assistant chief of the Bureau of Manufactures? None whatever; absolutely none. This official is to engage in a work that the gentleman from Tennessee says is of such trivial value that he casts the fruit of it into the waste basket every morning without giving it a moment's notice. Other gentlemen here seem to doubt the wisdom of doing this work at all; and yet before this official attempts to discharge the duties of his position that has been so recently created the typical economist upon the other side seeks to increase his salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Navigation: For Commissioner of Navigation, $4,000; four clerks of class 4; additional to one clerk designated as deputy commissioner, $600; clerk to Commissioner, $1,600; one clerk of class 3; two clerks of class 2; four clerks of class 1; nine clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; one assistant messenger; in all, $22,660.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend. On page 152, line 8, strike out the word "twenty-two" and insert "twenty-eight."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 152, line 8, strike out the word "twenty-two" and insert the word "twenty-eight."

Mr. LITTAUER. It is merely to correct the total.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Standards: For Director, $5,000; physicist, $4,000; chemist, $4,000; associate chemist, $2,500; 3 associate physicists, at $2,500 each; 1 associate physicist, $2,000; 3 assistant physicists, at $1,800 each; 5 assistant physicists, at $1,600 each; 1 assistant chemist, $1,600; assistant chemist, $1,400; 5 assistant physicists, at $1,400 each; 5 laboratory assistants, at $1,200 each; 6 laboratory assistants, at $1,000 each; six laboratory assistants, at $900 each; 2 aids, at $720 each; 2 aids, at $600 each; 3 laboratory apprentices, at $540 each; 4 laboratory apprentices, at $480 each; storekeeper, $1,000; librarian, $1,400; secretary, $2,000; 1 clerk of class 3; 1 clerk of class 2; 1 clerk of class 1; 1 clerk, $1,000; 2 clerks, at $900 each; 2 clerks, at $720 each; 3 messenger boys, at $360 each; 1 elevator boy, $360; chief mechanician, $1,600; mechanician, $1,400; 1 mechanician, $1,200; 2 mechanicians, at $1,000 each; mechanician, $900; 2 watchmen; skilled woodworker, $840; 2 skilled laborers, at $720 each; draftsman, $1,200; 2 assistant messengers; engineer, $1,800; 2 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; assistant engineer, $900; 3 firemen; electrician, $900; 3 laborers; janitor, $660; janitor, $600; and 2 female laborers, at $300 each; in all, $110,440.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "four thousand," in line 24, page 152, and insert the words "three thousand five hundred." Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a few observations on this paragraph, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have ten minutes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, from now on I must object. We want to finish the bill this afternoon.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not occupied sixty minutes of the time of the House in the entire Congress.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have no doubt of that, but we are nearly at the end of the bill, and we want to finish the bill this afternoon. There is some considerable work in going back——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I submit the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may have ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am entitled to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24, page 152, strike out the words "four thousand" and insert the words "three thousand five hundred."

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand, Mr. Chairman, why the gentleman from New York does not wish to grant an extension of time for the discussion of this item. He evidently does not want to see it exposed to the gaze of the House. I will try to do the best that I can in the way of explaining it in the limited time available under the rules.

If this paragraph did not lie under the protection of the 13-inch-gun rule brought into action two days ago—and a most extraordinary rule it is—you, Mr. Chairman, would be invited to consider a point of order against most of the items of appropriation which it contains, and I have no doubt, sir, that you would promptly put to sleep every one of them against which the rules would be invoked.

The act which created the Bureau of Standards was approved March 3, 1901. That act provided for fourteen employees, ranging from the head officer, called "Director," who was given an annual salary of $5,000, down to one laborer at an annual salary of $600. The first salary appropriation, that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and intended to pay the fourteen officials and employees just referred to, was $27,140. The salary appropriation for the current year is $99,660. It is a growth of nearly 400 per cent in expenses for salaries in five years. But, Mr. Chairman, we have not reached the end of this growth. The bill now under consideration provides for an increase of salary allowance up to $110,440. Since the passage of the act creating the bureau we have expended for apparatus over a quarter of a million dollars, and this bill asks for $40,000 more for the same purpose. As the bill of last year appropriated $40,000 for apparatus and that under consideration calls for the same sum for that purpose. I think we may assume that that amount, at least, will be asked for annually. These bureaus of the Government never show a descending scale of expenses, and this, the youngest of the lot, seems an unusually robust infant. It has a marvelous appetite for appropriations. As I have stated, it started with fourteen employees and officers. It now has on its rolls eighty-seven people drawing salaries. An increase of ten was asked for and an increase of eight was allowed by the committee. I will not undertake at this time to read to the committee the table which shows the rapid and expensive growth of this bureau, but will avail myself of the courtesy of the committee to have it printed with my speech.

Appropriations for Bureau of Standards.

Year.	Salaries.	Apparatus.	Fuel, heat, etc.
1902	$27,140	$30,000	$5,000
1903	36,060	30,000	5,000
1904	74,700	110,000	10,000
1905	85,780	74,000	11,000
			[a] 1,400

The bill under consideration (H. R. 16472) provides $110,440 for salaries; $40,000 for apparatus; $12,500 for heat, etc.; $1,000 for grading; $2,000 for travel expenses, and $2,750 for books.

The Bureau of Standards is, and very likely always will remain, a mystery to most of us. To men of just average intelligence and information it speaks in an unknown tongue about things which are not easily understood. However, the ray of light which occasionally penetrates the mysterious gloom of the report from the Bureau of Standards half inclines me to suspect that it is a mechanical repair shop masquerading behind scientific and learned phrases. Only one thing about it is perfectly clear, and that is its remarkable growth and insatiable appetite for appropriations.

Let us see what the report from the Director has to say about this institution. But before going into the report I want to turn for a moment to other sources of information and say something about the building occupied by the Bureau of Standards.

It is a new building in the outskirts of Washington, and has, so far, cost the taxpayers $325,000. Of course it was not intended to cost that much when the project was initiated. No bureau building ever is intended at its initiation to cost as much as is subsequently found necessary, and if the ultimate cost of the palace for the Bureau of Standards was in the minds of the officials and their friends they did not take Congress into their confidence. Like a good many other expensive buildings in other Departments of the Government, the original design was modest and economical compared to the ultimate cost. Congress, in the beginning, fixed $250,000 as the limit of cost. As usual, estimates submitted were found to be inadequate, and on appeal to Congress the limit of cost was increased by 30 per cent and up to $325,000. For the current year there was an appropriation of a thousand dollars for "repairs and alterations." Repairing and altering before the building is really completed suggests serious faults in design and construction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us turn to the report of the Director. What do we get for all this outlay? Do Members of the House generally know? How many of them if questioned by their constituents could tell what the Bureau of Standards is, what it does, what it costs, and what equivalent in service to the people it renders for this considerable outlay? A study of the report submitted by Director Stratton may enable them to answer any curious constituent who seeks light on this matter. It may may enable them to do so because a part of the report is so technical that its entire meaning is hidden from the layman. The first important fact that we learn is that all the buildings authorized by Congress have not been completed. The low-temperature laboratory, for example, is now building. It may arrive at the same moment with the coal strike.

The second important fact that we learn from the report of the Director is that the site of the Bureau of Standards is one of the most beautiful in the District of Columbia, and that its location is such that it will not require any considerable amount of grading, and it is the desire of the Bureau to retain the ground in a comparatively natural condition." And then we turn to this bill and learn that the amount appropriated for grading last year, which was $1,500, has been increased to $1,000.

Mr. Chairman, I am so much in love with the beautiful that I think we ought to gratify the Director in that matter of keeping his grounds in "a comparatively natural condition" despite his request for an appropriation of $1,000 to do this grading.

On the second printed page of the report we find a request for the purchase of more land. It is said to be "desirable" that the remaining portions of a certain block should be secured before other buildings are placed on it. It is not suggested that it is required or that the business of the Bureau may not be equally well done without it. It seems to be wanted because other buildings in the block would destroy or mar the beauty of the landscape.

What does the Bureau of Standards do? I asked several Members of Congress, and they were not only not able to tell me, but they did not even know of its existence. I then inquired of a scientific man connected with another bureau of the Government. He was not very positive, but said he thought it served a useful purpose, and on one occasion they had repaired some scientific instruments for him. When I asked him if that could not have been done just as well by the makers of the instruments he merely laughed.

They deal with weights and measures, two things that most men have a reasonable working knowledge of now. Under the heading "Measures of length" the Director tells us about some fine tools he has for measuring things, some of his apparatus being fixed with microscopes, and he promises to ascertain in the future whether the nickel-steel tapes used by the Coast and Geodetic Survey are suitable for measuring base lines. This opens up an avenue of possible trouble. Suppose that it should be found that they are not suitable for measuring base lines, may it not lead to a reopening of the boundary question between the United States and Canada and cause no end of trouble?

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman know that just such work was contemplated in the act that established this Bureau?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think that justifies it if it was.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman know of any bureau of the Government with a better foundation in law than this one has?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I know of none, Mr. Chairman, established with better foundation than the palace they have out there, or a more expensive one in proportion to the work that it is doing.

Mr. LITTAUER. Has the gentleman ever been out there?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman has seen it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes. I have never been through it.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman has seen the outside of it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman call it a palace?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, it cost $325,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. And contains machinery probably the finest in the world.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But the expenses for the apparatus are separately set forth in all of these appropriations.

Mr. LITTAUER. And the work performed as well.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman ought not to seek to convey the impression that the expense for the building is the same as that for the machinery that equips the building.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have five minutes more.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to object, but we have to finish this bill to-night.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not cut down the time on this matter in which he is so much interested.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that motion will not be in order until somebody has been heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is not this an amendment in the first degree? It is not an amendment to an amendment, is it?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the gentleman's own amendment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is it not in order for me to offer an amendment to this amendment before somebody speaks against the amendment? I have the floor and the recognition of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would feel bound first to recognize somebody desiring to be heard against the amendment, after which it would be in order for the gentleman to make his amendment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The Chair rules it is not in order for me to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that he would first feel bound to recognize some gentleman to speak against the amendment, and then it will be in order for the gentleman to move his amendment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. But I have the floor and nobody has offered to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No gentleman has yet been recognized, but if any gentleman desires to be heard he will be recognized.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will feel bound to first recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL], who first offered an amendment of that character.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment, and I am the first man who said he was.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to speak in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is defective in this, that the last word is superfluous. I move that it be stricken out. I would like to hear a defense made in behalf of that word by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think if the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] had permitted me to go on, I would have concluded my remarks by this time.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the gentleman from Texas may proceed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will deal frankly with the House. I have nothing to say, of course, with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], except to say that I appreciate the courtesy with which it is offered. I will say, with the tolerance of the House, a few words more and leave the matter to the judgment of the Members. If it had not been for that rule I referred to a little while ago, a whole series of increases in expenses and multiplication of offices would have gone out under points of order. Mr. Chairman, I have diligently and earnestly and frankly sought to find an excuse for the existence of this Bureau and for the cost which it entails upon the people.

The whole report, Mr. Chairman, seems a plea for existence. Details of work that appear trifling and inconsequential when it is remembered that they are for the information of the National Congress are gravely told in this remarkable report. We are given a sort of a diary of the happenings at the Bureau. We are made aware of the fact that during the year the State sealers of weights and measures met at the Bureau and that they were shown a collection of balances, weights, and measures. How exciting! And how wonderful are the opportunities for education in Washington. Then comes a statement that the increase of routine testing is so great that a larger force is needed to keep up with the work. Measures of volume have been asked after for "private individuals, including several manufacturers," but no proof is submitted that it does not still take 5 quarts to make a gallon in certain trades.

The report lays great stress on the measurement of time and the investigation of timepieces. At noon each day the Bureau receives a wireless message from the navy-yard, and then a confirmation of that from the Naval Observatory, and thus this great Bureau, which spends so much time and money on the scientific measurement of time, knows absolutely when it strikes 12. Such learning and exactness is really marvelous. But the long suit of the Bureau is in the testing of thermometers. During the year more than 13,000 thermometers of various kinds were tested. This seems to be the real occupation of the Director and his eighty-six assistants. They have to do with pyrometers and with optics, with spectroscopy, which seems to have something to do with refracted light, prisms, apparitions, and other ghostlike matters. They have an instrument shop also, for which an increased force is asked. Indeed, here and there throughout the report, if Members will take the trouble to read it, they will find requests for more land, more money, and more employees. They look after water meters, speed indicators, and paper testers, and have carefully investigated the adhesive power of mucilage. I presume that the information they gather about paper, mucilage, and other useful articles of that sort will be given to the manufacturers of the country, but, Mr. Chairman, is not the Government going rather far afield in this matter of rendering assistance to business houses?

In a private conversation with a Member of this House I learned that the work of the Bureau has been useful to the great United States Steel Corporation in the determination of the tensile strength and other qualities of steel. Great heavens, Mr. Chairman, is it possible that the taxpayers of the country are to be forced to confer still other favors upon this huge monopoly? The steel corporation is already intrenched behind a wall of tariff which makes a successful assault from the outside impossible, and yet we are called upon to maintain for their benefit here in Washington, at the public expense, this Bureau of Standards. The same gentleman also told me that the Bureau of Standards, which seems to be one of his pets, had investigated electric lighting, the standard of illumination, and the manner of its measurement to the consuming public.

I had always been under the impression it was the duty of municipal governments that granted those franchises to protect their own citizens against incorporated robbers of that sort. I hope, sir, if this Bureau is continued that they may persevere in that particular line of reform.

Mr. LITTAUER. They do, and they come to this Bureau to find out how to do it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do you think, sir, it is the duty of this Government to maintain a Bureau out here to promote the interests of the United States Steel Corporation, and do you not believe that great corporation, with all of its resources, can command the most technical skill the world offers?

Mr. LITTAUER. The act inaugurating this Bureau says it should do just that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is an additional reason why this Bureau should be reformed.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Does the gentleman not know the United States Steel Corporation and very many other similar institutions or large institutions maintain at a very large expense physical laboratories to do the very things for themselves that this institution is intended to accomplish for the public?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have been under the impression they maintain those people, and I am willing for them to go on maintaining them. I do not believe that it is properly a function of this Government, and I am very much inclined to believe that a mistake was made when this expensive Bureau was set up, and the sooner we check its extravagances the better. An outright repeal of the act of March 3, 1901, would, I believe, be in the interest of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "associate chemist, $2,500," and I desire now to address myself for a moment to the proposition. The law, the act of March 3, 1901, creates no such office, and hence this item is in the bill contrary to law I am sworn to obey.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state a little more definitely the proposition?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the words "associate chemist, $2,500," in line 25, on page 152, because the law allows no such expenditure and has created no such office.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 152, line 25, strike out the words "associate chemist, $2,500."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to be heard. I very much regret the chairman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], has shut off debate on this very important paragraph or its items. It carries too much money to be enacted in any such way. I, after a great deal of labor expended, have gotten data on this paragraph, which this House ought to well know and digest before action. There is not a man in this House who is familiar with this data, and I challenge the gentleman from New York to stand here now and give the amount of money by years that has been expended in this Bureau.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would state to the gentleman this: That this, an establishment——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, now you are looking at the book.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am going to answer your question, if you will wait long enough for an answer. I will say that they have expended from one hundred and forty to a hundred and sixty dollars a year for two years; that prior to that time they were housed in a little place over here——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the gentleman did not answer my question——

Mr. LITTAUER. I beg your pardon——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have it right here. I knew the gentleman did not know it, and hence I asked the question. [Laughter.] No one in this House knows.

"The National Bureau of Standards" was established by act of March 3, 1901, this being the name given to "the Office of Standard Weights and Measures," as this act shows.

Under the old law, repealed by this act, the appropriations made were as follows:

1893.

Salaries	110,440
Apparatus	40,000
Repairs	1,000
Fuel	12,500
Grading	4,000
Total	177,940

Had 71 employees in 1905 as against 14 in 1901, as the act of March 3 provided, and 87 employees in 1906, an increase of 16 people net, over 1905.

Employees added in 1906.

1 assistant physicist	$1,600
1 assistant chemist	1,600
1 physicist	1,800
1 laboratory assistant	1,000
2 aids, at $600 each	1,200

1 chief mechanician	1,600
1 skilled laborer	720
1 assistant engineer	1,000
1 fireman	720
1 laborer	630
2 laborers, at $360 each	720
Total	13,810

One employee was deceased, who was paid $360, thus making a net increase by additional employees in 1906 of $13,450.

Positions added by pending bill.

1 assistant physicist	1,600
2 assistant physicists, at $1,400 each	2,800
1 laboratory assistant	1,000
1 laboratory apprentice	540
1 clerk	1,000
1 clerk	900
1 clerk	900
Total	10,540

Total number new positions created, 9.

One of the above employees was dropped, who was paid $1,000, making a difference of $9,540.

This Department has increased from $5,290 under the old law, in the year 1895, to $13,450 under the present law, in 1906, and it is now proposed that the present bill shall carry $177,940.

Mr. Chairman, in March, 1901, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] got through the House the bill establishing this new Bureau by the mere skin of his teeth, so to speak, we created fourteen officers and appropriated $27,140 for them, and this bill to-day carries $177,000 and eighty-seven officers and employees.

Mr. LITTAUER rose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can not yield. You shut off my liberty and shut off my opportunity of giving light and knowledge to the people of this House that they ought to have. [Laughter.] I have helped the gentleman whenever he was right and opposed him when wrong as now.

Mr. LITTAUER. I want to help you.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can not listen to the gentleman. The gentleman has outraged the American Treasury. Not satisfied, Mr. Chairman, with curtailing the right of free speech and a patriotic consideration of this matter, he is racing up a great engine here to put in operation the mettle bill, which may come soon before the House, of which bill he is the great father. [Laughter.] It was stated on the floor of this House in March, 1901, that the "fees" coming from the users of this Bureau would "largely" pay for running it.

How much were the fees last year? A little over $11,000, and half of it was for the use of the Government of the United States, and was, of course, free, making about $5,500 come. "The fees will largely run this Bureau!" That is what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] said. Here is his speech. I will not take the time of the House to read it, but here it is, on the very day it passed in March, and now, under the wisdom of his great committee, we have gone to $177,940. Fourteen officers and $27,140 in salaries, Mr. Chairman, in the name of heaven, in 1901, to run this great public benefactor, now eighty-seven officers and $177,000! The gentleman from Ohio stated that England paid $80,000 a year to run its great benefactor, and we are expending $177,000 in this bill. Mr. Chairman, I favor a proper bureau, but not this size or at this expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. The gentleman will suspend a moment. The Chair, in order that there will be no misunderstanding, will read the rule on the subject of debate.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am sorry that the Chair did not get to read that before we got up this great fraud that shuts off all debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have great respect for the Chair, and he knows it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read for general information of all Members:

When general debate is closed by order of the House, any Member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the Member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to an amendment.

Now, if any gentleman desires the floor to be heard against the amendment the gentleman from Tennessee has offered, it is the duty of the Chair to recognize him before he can recognize anyone to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman to offer an amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have no disposition to proceed out of order. I have the greatest respect for the Chair, as the Chair knows, but the gentleman from New York has got in his motion of cutting out debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman from Tennessee has been very loud in his denunciation of this institution. I desire to say at the outset, if it has already become evident, that it is because he does not know anything about the institution of which he has been talking. [Laughter and applause.] I had the pleasure, during the Fifty-sixth Congress, of introducing a bill which resulted finally in the establishment of what is now called the "Bureau of Standards." It came into existence at the call of the manufacturing institutions of this country and it has served its purpose since that time as well as any Bureau in the Government service. The functions of the Bureau are stated in the law, where they are defined as consisting—in the custody of the standards; the comparison of the standards used in scientific investigations, engineering, manufacturing, commerce, and educational institutions with the standards adopted or recognized by the Government; the construction, when necessary, of standards, their multiples and subdivisions; the testing and calibration of standard measuring apparatus; the solution of problems which arise in connection with standards; the determination of physical constants and the properties of materials, when such data are of great importance to scientific or manufacturing interests and are not to be obtained of sufficient accuracy elsewhere.

It will occur to anyone who has read that portion of the act, to understand it, that the functions of this Bureau are important, that its operations are broad, and that they require a very high order of talent to carry them out. You would not attempt to run a blacksmith shop without a blacksmith, nor a carpenter shop without a carpenter; and if the work of that blacksmith or carpenter had to be taken as a model, as a standard for the work of other blacksmiths and other carpenters throughout the nation, you would say that this blacksmith and this carpenter should possess a high order of talent in their respective trades, and that they should be compensated accordingly. Now, in order to be capable of performing the duties required, in order to carry out the functions of this Bureau, the men who are charged with those responsibilities must possess a very high order of talent, and they must be paid accordingly. You can not secure the services of a man for $2,500 a year when somebody else will give him more than that salary for the same services elsewhere.

There are one or two more things that I wish to say. I said that this Bureau came into existence at the call of the great manufacturing institutions of the country; not necessarily the great manufacturing institutions, but the great manufacturing industry of the country. A great many of the larger institutions maintain extensive physical laboratories in which they do some, if not many of the things, that this Bureau is called upon to perform. These are important things. The manufacturing industry of the country knows that this institution is needed, and when it was first suggested, the manufacturers from one end of this land to the other enthusiastically indorsed the proposition to establish this Bureau of Standards.

Those who know of the results accomplished by the institution known as the "Reichsanstalt," in Germany, of the work done by the great physical laboratory in England, and by the great bureau of weights and measures in France, will know that there was some object and purpose in the establishment of this institution. There is the same object and purpose in its maintenance. There are no more men employed there than the work of that institution demands, and their average salaries are much less than those of many scientific bureaus. You may go out there to-day, as my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] did not do. He says he did, and he says he did not. He probably passed along the road by the side of which these buildings have been erected. I say, if you will go to that institution to-day you will find an institution conducted in an orderly way, performing what it is called upon to do by the Departments of this Government, and by those engaged in the great manufacturing industries of this country. The work which this Bureau is called upon to do is a valuable work; work which can not be performed elsewhere in the United States, for there is no other institution that has the extensive and varied equipment that this one has.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I hope the gentleman does not intend to create the impression that I have charged that the work they do is not well done. My contention is that it is an unnecessary expense, and one that the Government should not have gone into.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Until this Bureau of Standards was established all our standards went across the water to be standardized. The lamps used upon our naval vessels were sent over to the Reichsanstalt to be standardized there, because there did not exist in this country a recognized standard of light.

The work of the Bureau of Standards covers a wide range. Just now I understand they are engaged in the constructing of fundamental standards for electrical work. As I understand it, these are standard cells prepared for the purpose of testing the standards which are used throughout the country in measuring electric currents and electric pressures. Before we had the facilities provided by this Bureau we had to go to Germany and to the Reichsanstalt as a court of last resort in order to get real accuracy in measurements and standards. That was Germany's pride and our humiliation. I can not stop to mention the great impetus to manufacturing which it is universally contended that institution has given to Germany. It can scarcely be estimated in dollars and cents. Our Bureau of Standards is but a few years old. It had a small beginning, but it has had a remarkable growth and development. I have no doubt that it will prove to be to this country what the Reichsanstalt has been and is to Germany. A part of the expenses of running the Bureau are paid by charges made for work. The charges, however, are only nominal, and as yet have not contributed greatly to its support.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to throw down the gates and have this matter debated for forty or thirty minutes on a side. I am only too glad to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. LITTAUER. I must object.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] who has just taken his seat——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee to move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes. The gentleman who has just taken his seat brought forth some millimeters of applause a few moments ago when he stated that I was against this paragraph because I did not know anything about it or the law. Well, I thank him for the compliment. I have kept track of the gentleman in the committee, and the law of March 3, 1901, came from a committee of which I was a member. Since then this Bureau has grown from $27,140 and fourteen officers and employees to $177,000 and eighty-one officers and employees in this bill. Let us see what the gentleman from Ohio knew in 1901. Let us see what he said in his speech when this bill passed the House. He was asked by Mr. OTJEN:

Isn't it true that this bill provides a system of fees which will pay the expenses of running the Bureau?

And the gentleman from Ohio replied:

It will be largely self-supporting.

The fees in 1905 were $4,956.31; $2,786.43 were pay fees; and the appropriation for this Bureau in this bill for the next year is $187,000, and the gentleman is going to vote for it. "Largely self-supporting," this! Again he says in his speech—he was asked by that great watchdog of the Treasury, Judge Maddox, of Georgia:

What will be the annual cost?

And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] said:

It is proposed when that is all completed to employ a force of twenty-six persons.

Now we have eighty-seven provided for in this bill, and the gentleman from Ohio is going to vote for it.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman. Now, I will read a word or two to show what the gentleman knew who had the information in 1901 of a sanhedrim. [Laughter.] In reply to a further question by Judge Maddox, he said:

I suppose when that is done and the building is completed the total expense will be $314,009.

Now, we have spent about a million and a quarter on this project, including the money this bill carries for it—and here are the figures, $1,173,515—since the gentleman uttered those words in March, 1901.

Again he said:

I have already stated that Germany appropriates $100,000 for maintaining a similar institution, England $62,000, Austria $45,000, and Russia $46,000.

The present Speaker, Mr. CANNON, objected to the measure, and said it ought to be a part of the Geodetic Survey. Ah, did the gentleman from Ohio have all the information when he made that speech as to what it would cost and as to what the cost of running it would be? Wasn't all this an argument to his fellow-Members to induce them to support the bill on the ground that it would cost less than $100,000; or what England paid, $62,000? And here he stands back of a bill appropriating $177,000—$110,000 in salaries as against $21,000 when he uttered that Ciceronian speech on the floor of this House.

Hence, Mr. Chairman, I make my motion. There is no law for this office and I move to strike it out of the bill because there is no law for it. The law (March 3, 1901) provides for only one director, at $5,000; one physicist, at $3,500; one chemist, at $3,500; two assistant physicists, at $2,200 each; one laboratory assistant, at $1,400; one laboratory assistant, at $1,200; one secretary, at $2,000; one clerk, at $1,200; one messenger, at $720; one engineer, at $1,500; one mechanician, at $1,400; one watchman, at $720; one laborer, at $600; and here, Mr. Chairman, is a bill providing for eighty-one persons, when the law only provides for fourteen. The gentleman said it wouldn't cost more than $21,000 when he made that great speech that would have caused Demosthenes to turn over in his grave if he had heard it. [Laughter.] I make the point that there is no law for it. I have just read the list, copied literally—the law of March 3, 1901. Right in the face of the law this thing has gone on, Congress has been chloriformed with appropriation eloquence since this law has been passed with the results I have tried to make plain to you. The appropriation bills have been padded from fourteen officers up to now it is asked for eighty-seven, from $27,000 appropriated at first, it is now $177,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and the amendment thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate on the paragraph and the amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when we created the Department of Commerce and Labor the Bureau of Standards was transferred from the Treasury Department to the new Department. In connection with the work in reference to that I made some investigation of the Bureau of Standards. I wish to say to my distinguished friends from Tennessee and Texas that before the Bureau of Standards was moved, with what slight knowledge I could bring to bear upon it, I made a very careful examination of the plant and the building directly south of me, and since the Bureau of Standards has been moved out on the road, with a spirit of curiosity, if nothing more, on several occassions I have gone through the Bureau from top to bottom, examining the work which they were doing; and I have no hesitancy in saying, Mr. Chairman, that there is no more important work being conducted by the Government in behalf of the people, apart from the ordinary governmental agencies, than is done by the Bureau of Standards. It is worthy of being placed alongside of the Bureau of Soils and other important bureaus in the Department of Agriculture.

The work done by this Bureau of Standards has resulted in saving a large sum of money to the manufacturing interests of the country, which before that were required to go to Germany to standarize their electrical instruments and other instruments that required careful and fine standards. It was impossible even—to take a simple illustration, one of the simplest that the Bureau of Standards deals with—it was impossible before the Bureau of Standards was created to obtain a thermometer in the country that could give the temperature to a correct degree. Now almost every manufacturer of thermometers in this country comes to the Bureau of Standards to obtain his standard of temperature. That is a simple illustration, but when you go out beyond the simple illustration into the domain of electrical science, into the domain of mechanical engineering, you reach a position which it is impossible for me to comprehend, except as I see the work done in the Bureau before me, and see that people are demanding that this work be done.

The increase in the force, Mr. Chairman, comes because of the increase of the work done. There is no work done at the Bureau of Standards that is not needed and not demanded; and these people provided for in this Bureau, permit me to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], are not clerks sitting at a desk drawing fancy salaries. Most of them are workmen, most of them are skilled mechanics, skilled in professional experience, men who put on their overalls in the Bureau, men who work with mechanical instruments standardizing the instruments that are used throughout the country. This is not a fancy Bureau. It is no dress-parade Bureau. This is a working Bureau of the Government, just as some of the bureaus are in the Agricultural Department. My only regret is that we have not more bureaus of this kind under the Government supervision doing work which is needed, not merely for the benefit of the steel trust—they would be able to do their own work, perhaps—but this work goes out throughout the country. No manufacturer, no producer so poor but he may receive the benefit of the work of this Bureau of Standards.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that there is no one so poor that he is not able to get some benefit from this Bureau. I want to state to him that Doctor Stratton, the Director of this Bureau, says: "The effect of the fee is to prevent sending in things that ought not to be tested. The Bureau would be flooded with work if we did not charge a fee." He states somewhere here that he has done work for Mr. Carnegie and others. Does the gentleman think that that is a very fine Bureau for the "people," under those circumstances?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that a large share of the work that he refers to is testing thermometers; a very simple proposition, and, of course, the manufacturer of a thermometer if he can obtain an official statement from the Bureau of Standards that his thermometer is graded correctly, has a little advantage, and if he obtains that there is no reason why he should not pay for the work to do it. That is all there is to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Where does this fee go?

Mr. MANN. To the Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have a number of amendments here which I desire to make to this paragraph. I do not wish to burden the committee unnecessarily. I am perfectly earnest and sincere in all of this.

Mr. MANN. No one who knows the gentleman will doubt that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Absolutely so. I would not take up the time of the committee if under the rule which was adopted yesterday no amendment is in order. I understood the Chairman to say just now to me, privately, I will say, that no amendment is in order because of that rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no; the gentleman misunderstood the rule. Amendments are in order. A point of order will not lie against this paragraph. The gentleman can offer any amendment that he desires.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then a motion to strike out is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the words "three associate physicists, at $2,000 each," in lines 1 and 2, page 153, because the law does not provide for or create such offices.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that debate is closed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This is my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not debatable.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am merely stating my amendment. Now, let me state this, and I am done——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that no debate is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How is it that the Chair permitted debate upon the other amendments, one of which I made, and does not permit it on this?

The CHAIRMAN. Because debate was limited to ten minutes, and when the ten minutes had expired——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But this is a new amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. But the House has voted to close all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, I beg the pardon of the House. I did not so understand it—the confusion is so great.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel for heat, light, and power; office expenses, stationery, books and periodicals (subscriptions to periodicals may be paid in advance); traveling expenses; expenses of the visiting committee; expenses of attendance of American member at the meeting of the International Committee of Weights and Measures; traveling expenses of two delegates to the International Committee of Electrical Units and Standards, one of whom shall be an officer or employee of the Bureau of Standards; and contingencies of all kinds, $12,500.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] tell the committee how much money has been expended upon this committee—these meteorological pilgrims who have been going around over the world—under such an appropriation, which has been carried in this bill for four or five years?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman refers to something that I do not understand.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is a provision in here, and has been since this law was created, providing for a delegate to go somewhere to see about something, and I want to know what the office of that delegate is and how much we have thus appropriated since this Bureau has been established. It runs up into the thousands of dollars.

Mr. LITTAUER. This representative is provided for by international treaty between the United States, France, and Great Britain, and, I believe, Germany and a number of other countries. The total amount of expense in connection with this conference, I think, is something less than a thousand dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken, Mr. Chairman, about that. I have the amounts here, if I only had time to read them, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee; but I want to say to the committee, to be short, that it is away over a thousand dollars.

Mr. LITTAUER. How much is it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is not done by treaty, and I think the original act provided something about these amounts.

Mr. LITTAUER. The statute carries out the treaty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, every year we are sending—unnecessarily, I think—somebody abroad to see something about the metric system and weights and measures.

Mr. TAWNEY. Two hundred and forty-eight dollars is the amount expended last year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And before we get through with this session of Congress I will say, gentlemen, it will cost us over a thousand dollars.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Regular order!

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from Georgia, who helped to report this bill and does not explain these matters, will give those who have a little desire to know something about these matters some little time, without calling for the regular order in my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Make a motion to strike out or amend.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have done that, and I had the floor legitimately.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor, as his time has not expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, is there an amendment before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, let us see about the traveling agents or committee. In 1893 it was $600; 1894, $500; 1895, $500; 1896, $500; 1897, $500; 1898, $500; 1899, $475; 1900, $475; 1901, $475; 1902, $475. I do not know how much is carried in this bill. Now, does that look like much less than a thousand dollars?

Mr. LITTAUER. A year. The cost is less than half the amount I stated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But the gentleman did not say a year.

Mr. LITTAUER. Assuredly you do not think I was going back over all the history of this treaty and state the total amount of cost since the beginning. I gave the annual amount expended. We deal here in annual figures.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman should have said it was for the year only. I say this thing of giving somebody a summer trip to go to Mexico or to go to England and come back here and tell us we must establish the metric system, or any other system concerning the Bureau of Weights and Measures, every year, is an extravagance that ought to be stopped. [Applause.] That is what I say, and the facts bear me out. If he ever made a report, nobody has ever heard of it. I wish somebody would send that to me, instead of irrigation papers or the morning commercial billets-doux I get. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to strike out the last word. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. It shall not be lawful hereafter for any clerk or other employee in the classified service in any of the Executive Departments to be transferred from one Department to another Department until such clerk or other employee shall have served for a term of three years in the Department from which he desires to be transferred.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Add after line 18, page 162, the following:

"The heads of Departments, offices, and bureaus appropriated for by this act shall grade the clerical work to be performed in their respective Departments before the 30th of June, 1906, into as many grades as there are classes in the classified service of the United States, as provided under Rule XIII of the civil-service rules and promulgated by the President, and thereafter all employees included in said classification shall be employed only upon the grade of work corresponding with their respective classes. Every person employed in said classification service shall receive payment for the grade of work which he performs and no other."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain this provision.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order on the amendment, on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, one of the great complaints we hear from the Committee on Appropriations and one of the great complaints that exists is that the clerks in the Departments are not doing the service corresponding with their classification—that is to say, a clerk who gets $1,800 is doing work that would be appropriate to a clerk getting $900 a year, and a $900 clerk was doing work that would be appropriate to an $1,800 clerk—two clerks sitting at the same desk doing precisely the same work and paid a different rate of pay. One man gets $900, another gets $2,000. Well, of course, it does not take a philosopher or a sage to see that that state of things creates a great deal of dissatisfaction, and it is very subversive of discipline in the Departments. Now, this classification is desired by at least 90 per cent of all the clerks in the Departments. It is desired by a great many of the chiefs of Departments. It has been long desired by the Civil Service Commission. In their report for 1903 they recommend this classification. Now, there seems to be a disposition on the part of the Committee on Appropriations and on the part of Members of the House to meet this difficulty in some way if possible by this method of classifying the clerical work, requiring every clerk to do work appropriate to his class, making a $900 clerk do $900 work and an $1,800 clerk do $1,800 work. That seems to me to be a step in the right direction, and that is what the amendment proposes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, the gentleman knows, of course, that in many branches of the public service there are different rates of salaries for substantially the same kind of service. This is recognized throughout the country, in State and municipal service. We will perhaps be called upon in a very few days to vote on a bill concerning the salaries of the school-teachers, some of whom are paid $600 and up to $750 for doing exactly the same kind of work, because the term of service is an element to be considered, and then the question of possible promotion and moral effect upon the civil service is a very important one to be considered. Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman seems to me would involve a radical reorganization of the entire executive civil service. There are doubtless various clerks in different Departments doing substantially the same kind of work at different pay. Now, I have no doubt it is true; and I am sure that it is the effort of the civil service——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. PALMER. I have not yielded the floor; I supposed the gentleman from Indiana wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I started in with the view of asking the gentleman a question, but forgot about it. [Laughter.] I was diverted, and some thoughts came to me that I thought I would take occasion to express. But, in view, Mr. Chairman, of the great importance of this question and the radical effect it will have upon the public service, I shall have to insist on my point of order. I do not think that we ought to take the matter up.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, there is no reform or amendment ever proposed that was not supposed to be radical by somebody. Now, in view of the importance of this subject, I suggest that by the time that this bill comes back again, if this amendment is allowed to go on, there will be an opportunity for the gentleman from Indiana, and for anybody who desires to do so, to investigate this subject. I have investigated it.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question and not make a speech. As I understand, in these different Departments it is conceded by all that there are clerks doing the same work who, in the War Department, for instance, get $1,200 and in some other bureau get $900; and so we have clerks all the time trying to get a transfer to the Department where they get the highest pay. That is the fact, is it not?

Mr. PALMER. I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you think that evil would be reached and remedied by the amendment which you have offered?

Mr. PALMER. No; I do not think it would have anything to do with that.

Mr. LITTAUER. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not to the transfer section.

Mr. PERKINS. That evil would not be at all changed by this amendment?

Mr. PALMER. No.

Mr. LITTAUER. I understand your amendment to classify the individuals who do the same work, and that they shall receive the same pay, and it has no relation to the transfer provision?

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to suggest that it does seem to me that some step should be taken by the Committee on Appropriations, however laborious it may be, to look into the evil created by men in the various Departments doing the same work for different pay.

Mr. LITTAUER. As far as I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it is in that line. Whether it will accomplish it or not, whether it will not have disadvantages of its own, I am not sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon his point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My point of order is that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. PALMER. If the Chair please, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. PALMER. Section 5 provides that—

It shall not be lawful hereafter for any clerk or other employee in the classified service in any of the Executive Departments to be transferred from one Department to another Department until such clerk or other employee shall have served for a term of three years in the Department from which he desires to be transferred.

Now, there are two reasons why this amendment is in order. In the first place, it is a limitation on the appropriation. It provides that this money shall only be paid out in the manner prescribed—that is to say, before any clerk shall get any of this money he shall be classified, and his emolument shall depend upon his classification, and that he shall do the work for which he is classified. It seems to me that is a limitation on the appropriation and the expenditure of money and therefore in order.

The other point I wish to make is this, that under the rule which was adopted, all points of order on this bill were done away with. That is to say, you could not make a point of order on anything contained in the bill. Now, this provision of section 5 is new legislation, and as such it is subject to amendment. And if the section itself is not subject to a point of order, then the amendment to it can not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is that the proposed amendment is not germane to the section. I understand that the section is new legislation; therefore anything that is germane to the section would be in order, notwithstanding it may change existing law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. This section to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania offers the amendment relates exclusively to the transfer of clerks from one Department to the other, for the purpose—and it will undoubtedly, to some extent, have the effect—of equalizing the compensation of clerks doing the same class of work, and tend to bring about a classification. I understand that the purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is along that line. It relates to the classification of the clerks in the Departments, so as to discourage, if not to prevent, a clerk from desiring a transfer to some other Department; because if the heads of the Departments classify their work according to the classification made by law for the clerks in all the different Departments, then all the clerks of one class doing a certain grade of work will get one rate of pay, and, therefore, there would be no inducement for them to desire a transfer; and for that reason I think it is germane.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The connection between the section and the amendment, according to the interpretation given the amendment by the gentleman from Minnesota, is entirely too remote. The section deals solely and entirely with the question of transfers of clerks from one Department to another. Under existing law there is a system of transfers, and this section simply provides that clerks shall not be transferred from a Department until they have served in that Department for three full years, that is all. It deals purely and simply with the question of transfers. Now, any amendment that is germane to the subject of transferring clerks from one Department to another would be in order to this section, but the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no possible connection with the subject of this section. In answer to a question from the gentleman from Minnesota, or the gentleman from New York, I do not remember which, he admitted that this amendment had nothing to do with the question of transfers. It has nothing to do with that question. If we could engage in speculation and hold propositions in order upon the fine-spun doctrine announced by the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, amendments would be in order to regulate the salaries of all the clerks in all the Departments, because it might make transfers more or less desirable.

Mr. HOAR. On the same theory an amendment relating to the number of hours that the clerks should work would be in order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. As suggested by the gentleman, an amendment regulating the number of hours that clerks should work would also be in order. The whole subject would be open to legislation if this amendment were in order. I think it is clear that the amendment is not germane to the question of transfer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule. It has often been held that where a paragraph changing existing law is permitted to remain in the bill it may be perfected by any germane amendment. By the operation of the rule adopted yesterday this section 5 is permitted to remain in the bill. The Chair is of the opinion that it does change existing law, and that it is therefore subject to be perfected by any germane amendment; and if the only objection were that the proposed amendment does change existing law, the Chair would overrule the point of order.

But the objection that the amendment is not germane to section 5 requires an examination and comparison. It appears that section 5 relates wholly to the transfers of clerks in the classified service from one Department to another, providing that no clerk shall be transferred until he shall have served at least three years in the Department from which he desires to be transferred. The amendment on the other hand relates not to transfers, but provides for a classification, not of clerks, but of the work which they are to perform and upon which they are to be engaged. It requires that they shall be employed upon no other work than upon the work so classified, each clerk according to the proper class. It applies not merely to clerks transferred or desiring to be transferred, but to all work done by clerks and to all clerks.

That seems to the Chair a change of existing law upon a subject different from that embraced in the pending section. Therefore, for the reason that it is not germane, the Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania urges that it is a limitation on the appropriation. It does not seem, however, to limit the appropriation. The appropriations have been made in previous sections. This amendment does not impose a condition upon the payment of that money. Furthermore, it is a principle well established that in order to be a limitation the provision must cover only the year for which the appropriation is made. This proposed amendment, as its language clearly indicates, is intended for permanent legislation. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I move that amendment as a separate section, to be numbered section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers as a separate section his amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a separate section:

"The heads of Departments, offices, and bureaus appropriated for by this act shall grade the clerical work to be performed in their respective Departments before the 30th of June, 1906, into as many grades as there are classes in the classified service of the United States as provided in rule 13 of the civil service rules as promulgated by the President, and thereafter all employees included in said classification shall be employed only upon the grade of work corresponding with their respective classes. Every person employed in the said classified service shall receive payment for the grade of work which he performs and no other."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to make a point of order to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order it will be in order to perfect the paragraph, and the gentleman from South Carolina desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "transfer," in line 18, page 162, add the following words: "Nor shall any clerk be transferred from one bureau or division to another bureau or division in the same Department at an increased salary, nor shall any clerk so transferred from one bureau or division to another bureau or division be promoted within one year."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I don't care to raise the question whether or not that is subject to a point of order. I believe an explanation would be sufficient to convince the House that it is impracticable.

Mr. KEIFER. I think a point of order would lie against that. I make the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I raise the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio first made the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I withdraw the point of order, if the gentleman wishes to be heard.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the amendment is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That the amendment is clearly not germane because the question of promotion has no relation to the question of transfer.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think it is absolutely impracticable, and I think I can show the committee that it is in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 5 relates to the transfer of clerks in the classified service from one Department or division to another Department or division, and declares that no clerk shall be so transferred until he has served three years in the Department from which he desires to be transferred. The proposed amendment seems to the Chair to be germane. It also relates to transfers in the classified service and nothing else. True it speaks of promotions, but only in cases of transfers. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, it developed in taking the testimony before the committee that one bureau and one Department after another came before the Appropriation Committee asking for an increase in the salaries of their clerks and employees. One of the reasons given for asking for the increase was that unless the increase was granted they could not keep their forces. It developed, further, that these employees are not going out of the Government service, but that they are simply going from one bureau or one Department to another.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact that the testimony showed that the complaint of the heads of Departments was not on account of the transfer from one bureau to another in the same Department, but a transfer from one Department to another Department, and that is what this amendment is intended to correct?

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not read it that way.

Mr. LITTAUER. How can there be any complaint at the transfer of a clerk from one division to another division in the same Department, with one head in control over both divisions? The detail transfers between the different bureaus or departments come under the head of one Department, who controls them completely.

Now, is it practicable, or is it impracticable, to deny the right of detail from one bureau to another? Here we are now, on March, appropriating for the work of all the bureaus of the Departments here in Washington for the next year. We can not appropriate in such a way without giving them the maximum force that would ever be used, unless we give them the right to detail from one bureau to another bureau in the same Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from South Carolina yields to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman; I yield.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman's purpose and mine are in the same direction. What we seek to do is to prevent one Department bidding against another Department, offering higher salaries for the same work in one Department than is paid in another Department. Clerks find this out quickly. They are on the alert, and naturally seek to get the highest salary possible. Of course, the heads of the different Departments want to get the best force they can, and one method of securing the best clerks is by coming to us with recommendations for new forces of the higher grades of compensation. The head of every bureau desires to keep the clerks who have proved efficient through experience, yet none refuse these transfers.

They simply say, "We do not want to prevent a man from bettering his condition." We claim that the experience gained in one Department should remain to the benefit of that Department until at least the official has remained there for three years. When you come to trying to curb the right of detail from one bureau to another bureau in the same Department, it is a dangerous thing. Take, for instance, the Treasury Department. If they had not the right of detail from one bureau to another, I dare say that the work in four or five of their great divisions to-day would be practically at a standstill. We must allow the right of detail, but I agree that promotion through detail is wrong and unwarranted.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying when interrupted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], the testimony developed the fact that these bureau chiefs and superintendents at the head of the bureaus and divisions could not keep their forces together, for the reason that the chiefs of other bureaus and divisions were offering larger salaries, and these clerks were transferred.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to have five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have interrupted the gentleman, and I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the ridiculous position that the Government is in is that numerous men in control whose duty it is to employ Government help are bidding against one another. Can you conceive the idea of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company or the New York Central Railroad Company permitting the men in their executive offices to bid against one another for the clerks they have to employ?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have heard the statement that Departments bid against each other for clerks. I understand that the salaries in all the classified service for the various classes of clerks is absolutely the same; that it is fixed by law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, but there is a wide interpretation under that. I know that clerks in class 1 are doing the same work that clerks in class 4 are.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is what I want to understand. The salaries are all the same, but they offer better opportunities for advancement and promotion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; a man may be working in one bureau at a salary of $1,200, and he finds that some other bureau will give him $1,800.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is, that will promote him, give him a higher class, put him in class 4, for instance?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; in class 4.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And, therefore, it emphasizes the importance from that standpoint of the gentleman's amendment. It is all a question of promotion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in perfect accord with the provision incorporated in this bill by the committee. I have tried to study the situation as well as any man not on the committee could do it. I want to go further than they have gone. They have provided that transfers shall not be made from one Department to another. I want to provide that transfers shall not be made in one bureau of a Department to another bureau in the same Department. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] says that I want to cut off promotions. I do not. I want to see the clerks promoted from time to time as they deserve promotion, but I insist that the promotion shall come in the regular way in their own bureau or division. For instance, there is a vacancy in class 4, we will say, in a certain division or bureau. We are to promote some clerk from class 3 to that place; but with this transfer privilege, instead of promoting some clerk of class 3 in that division who has earned the promotion, they are at liberty to go into some other bureau and select some pet and bring him into the bureau and make him a class 4 clerk.

What I insist upon is that when a vacancy occurs in the higher grade of clerkship that vacancy should be filled by a promotion from that particular bureau; that the man immediately under him should have a chance. It does not cut off promotion; it does not even prohibit the transfer of a clerk from one bureau or division to another, but it does do this: It says that if you transfer from one bureau to another you must transfer a man to the same grade that he was in before transfer. If he was a class 3 clerk before being transferred, he must be a class 3 clerk when he is detailed to some other bureau, because if you do not put that provision in there he could be transferred as a class 3 clerk and the next day promoted to class 4, so I put in a provision that he shall not be transferred and immediately promoted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I have another minute?

Mr. LITTAUER. I must ask now that this debate close.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON) there were—ayes 21, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers and amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 18, page 162, insert:

"The heads of Departments, offices, and bureaus appropriated for by this act shall grade the clerical work to be preformed in their respective Departments before the 30th of June, 1906, into as many grades as there are classes in the classified service of the United States, as provided in Rule XIII of the civil-service rules as promulgated by the President, and thereafter all employees included in said classification shall be employed only upon the grade of work corresponding with their respective classes. Every person employed in the said classified service shall receive payment for the grade of work which he performs and no other."

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order against the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is new legislation and changes existing law.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. KEIFER. And it does not come within the rule adopted day before yesterday.

Mr. PALMER. I understand the gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order until I explain the case. Mr. Chairman, by the civil-service rules of 1889, which were promulgated by the President of the United States in the exercise of a power vested in him by the Constitution and the authority given to him by the seventeen hundred and fifty-third section of the Revised Statutes, he classified the clerical service of the United States under Rule XIII into several classes, as follows:

Class A. All persons receiving an annual salary of less than $720, or a compensation at the rate of less than $720 per annum.

Class B. All persons receiving an annual salary of $720 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $720 or more, but less than $840 per annum.

Class C. All persons receiving an annual salary of $840 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $840 or more, but less than $900 per annum.

Class D. All persons receiving an annual salary of $900 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $900 or more, but less than $1,000 per annum.

Class E. All persons receiving an annual salary of $1,000 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $1,000 or more, but less than $1,200 per annum.

Class 1. All persons receiving an annual salary of $1,200 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $1,200 or more, but less than $1,400 per annum.

Class 2. All persons receiving an annual salary of $1,400 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $1,400 or more, but less than $1,600 per annum.

Class 3. All persons receiving an annual salary of $1,600 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $1,600 or more, but less than $1,800 per annum.

Class 4. All persons receiving an annual salary of $1,800 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $1,800 or more, but less than $2,000 per annum.

Class 5. All persons receiving an annual salary of $2,000 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $2,000 or more, but less than $2,500 per annum.

Class 6. All persons receiving an annual salary of $2,500 or more, or a compensation at the rate of $2,500 or more per annum.

That is the official classification, and under that the pay of these clerks is fixed. I would like to know what sense there is in having a classification of clerks or salaries unless the work is also classified. What reason is there for giving a man who gets $750 a year the work which ought to be done by a clerk who gets $2,500 a year, and what reason or sense is there in having two men sitting at the same desk and doing the same work, one of them paid a thousand dollars a year and the other one eighteen hundred dollars a year? I want to say there is no business in this country that is so illy conducted as the business of Uncle Sam, except the Lord's business. In His business fifty agencies are often established in one town where three agencies could do the work. It is in the testimony before committees of this House that 33 per cent of the clerks in these Departments could be discharged and the efficiency of the service be increased 33 per cent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. PALMER. Well, 25 per cent; I do not care about the percentage. Here is a proposition that seems at least to be in the line of reform and economy, and yet the gentleman from Indiana thinks it his duty to insist on a point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I think this appropriation bill has all the legislation that is due it already. I do not believe this measure ought to be considered at this time and under these circumstances. It is clearly new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point that the proposed new section changes existing law in violation of the rule of the House upon that subject, and the gentleman from Ohio adds the additional point that it is not within the provision of the special rule adopted by the House yesterday and under which we are proceeding. The Chair understands that this is the same matter which was offered as an amendment to section 5. The Chair then said that it was not subject to the objection of changing existing law, because the section to which it was offered was open to the same charge. But it was ruled out because not germane to the section. It is now offered as an independent section, and is not aided by the fact that some other section offends. It manifestly changes existing law, and the Chair must sustain both points of order.

The Clerk proceeded to read section 8.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know if section 8 has been taken out of this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. It has not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 8 is still in the bill, but is subject to a point of order, not being within the protection of the special rule adopted yesterday.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to make the point of order at the right time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. After June 30, 1906, there shall not be employed in any Executive Department or other Government establishment in the District of Columbia any person in the classified service who is 65 years of age and under 68 years of age at a rate of annual compensation exceeding $1,000, or who is 68 years of age and under 70 years of age at a rate of annual compensation exceeding $1,200, or who is over 70 years of age at a rate of annual compensation exceeding $840; and after June 30, 1913, no person in the classified service shall be continued in the employment of any such Executive Department or other Government establishment who has attained 70 years of age.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation, in contravention of Rule XXI, paragraph 2.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order, and every Member of the House as well as myself has knowledge of the fact.

Mr. PRINCE. Does the gentleman make the point of order, or will he reserve it?

Mr. KEIFER. The hour is too late to have a discussion which will come to nothing, so I shall have to insist, and do insist, on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to make the point of order and insist upon it, and will therefore rule.

The second clause of Rule XXI, an ancient and time-honored rule, contains this provision:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The present law pays no regard to the ages of clerks. It provides for different salaries for different classes of clerks, but allows the same salary to all clerks in the same class, regardless of age.

Section 8 of this bill requires a classification based upon age, a basis of classification unknown to the present law. Its provisions can not be said to be purely in limitation of appropriations carried by the bill, which are for the year ending June 30, 1907. The language used clearly shows that permanent legislation is intended. It declares, among other things, that after June 30, 1913, no person who has attained the age of 70 shall be continued in the classified clerical service of the Executive Departments. The enactment of these provisions would certainly change existing law. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the point of order must be sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are repealed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I gave notice——

Mr. LITTAUER. Before the gentleman proceeds, I would like to ask unanimous consent to correct the number of the last section, section 8 having gone out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I give notice to return to page 17, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of complying with the resolution of the House raising the salary of the cloakroom men on that side of the House and on this side from $60 to $70; and I move, on page 17, in line 16, to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy," in harmony with the resolution of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PRINCE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. I would like to know if the Committee on Appropriations, by resolution or otherwise, has authorized the doing of this, as required by the special rule of the House?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say that the House authorized it, and the Committee on Appropriations is now doing it through one of their members.

Mr. LACEY. I want to make inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia—who does this include?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It includes the men specified in the resolution of the House.

Mr. LITTAUER. I understand this is covered by resolution No. 145.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, to make the bill in harmony with the change made, on page 19, line 25, I move to strike out "seven hundred and twenty" and insert "eight hundred and forty."

Mr. LITTAUER. That is simply in the totals.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is all.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will ask general consent for that later on.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let us correct this while we are at it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. On page 20 the same correction will have to be made, line 4—"seven hundred and twenty" will be stricken out and "eight hundred and forty" will be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be made as indicated by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the terms of House resolution 288, reported by the Committee on Rules and passed by this House on Wednesday last, I am authorized by the Committee on Appropriations to move to insert in this bill now pending all items stricken therefrom on points of order. I send to the Clerk's desk all of these items and move that they be taken up one after another.

Mr. TAWNEY. You mean to insert them in gross?

Mr. LITTAUER. Insert them in gross, and then consider them one after the other.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, in lines 24 and 25, insert "Two laborers, at $820."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before we proceed to the consideration of these items that have gone out on a point of order, ought not the committee to vote to reinsert all of them in gross, and then take them up in order? From this it would appear that we are considering them before they have been reinserted. I think the procedure should be, and the motion of the gentleman from New York was, to reinsert them in gross, and then take them up seriatum and consider them one after the other and dispose of them.

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe the rule contemplates such insertion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, if we reinstate them in gross, then we shall have to move to strike them out. The rule, as I understand it, was that the Appropriations Committee could move to reinsert them and that they would not be subject to points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the rule, so far as it relates to this matter:

Upon motion authorized by the Committee on Appropriations it shall be in order to insert in any part of the bill any provision reported as part of the bill and heretofore ruled out on a point of order.

It shall be in order upon motion to reinsert. The Chair therefore thinks that the motion must be made. By unanimous consent one motion can cover them all, but any gentleman desiring it is entitled to a separate vote on each.

Mr. LITTAUER. I ask unanimous consent that all these items be considered as reinserted in the bill. They can then be taken up by the committee one after another for determination by the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. If you reinsert them there is no use in taking them up any further.

Mr. KEIFER. Why, they are only reinserted conditionally.

Mr. LITTAUER. Reinserted for the consideration of the committee, without being subject to points of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They can not be considered unless they are reinserted. The motion simply puts them in shape so that the Committee of the Whole can handle them; that is all.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PRINCE. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRINCE. The rule says that upon motion authorized by the Committee on Appropriations it shall be in order to insert in any part of the bill any provision. Now, if they are inserted in gross in the bill what is the use of disturbing——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not open to argument at this time. The Chair has stated that except by unanimous consent they can not be reinserted in gross. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. TAWNEY. The motion of the gentleman from New York was that they be reinserted in gross and taken up for consideration one after the other in the order in which they have been stricken out, just as in the original bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I did not ask unanimous consent; I made a motion to that effect.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, if you will pardon me, the rule does not indicate whether they shall be reinserted separately or in gross. That is our business, to make the motion, and the House can agree to the motion if it wishes to.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule states that upon motion authorized by the committee, and so forth, it shall be in order to insert, in any part of the bill, any provision.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Any of them. Now, we propose to insert all of them.

Mr. TAWNEY. That means that they can be inserted in gross, and when they are inserted they are inserted for consideration just as though they had not been stricken out of the bill. The purpose is simply to reform the bill as it was reported to the House, in order that these provisions may be considered separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand the rule.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the first item that was reported as a part of the bill and ruled out on a point of order be reinserted and adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to suggest that we have a new rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to know if, inasmuch as the items were stricken out under the rules of the House which were approved by the House, it does not require legislative action to put them back?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to put the question to the committee so that it might, at its option, take that legislative action. The Clerk will read the first item.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, lines 24 and 25, insert "two laborers, at $820 each," instead of "one laborer, at $820."

Page 15, line 2, insert "three laborers" instead of "four laborers."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 14, after the word "dollars," insert "assistant clerk, $1,500."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CURRIER. Is it not in order to offer an amendment to that paragraph now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I object.

Mr. CURRIER. It is an amendment to make the clerk for the Committee on Patents an annual clerk instead of a session clerk. It is an amendment germane to the paragraph. Do I understand the Chair to rule that an amendment can not be offered from the floor to this bill, to the paragraph under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. CURRIER. No; to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, except by unanimous consent, we can not go back to a paragraph that has been passed.

Mr. CURRIER. Not a paragraph that has been passed, but the paragraph in question, the one now under consideration, page 14, line 24.

Mr. BURLESON. That did not go out on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state the special rule:

Upon motion authorized by the Committee on Appropriations, it shall be in order to insert in any part of the bill any provision reported as a part of the bill and heretofore ruled out on a point of order.

The Chair understands that the gentleman from New Hampshire is desirous of offering an amendment, not a matter authorized by the Committee on Appropriations and not on a matter which has been ruled out, but an entirely new amendment to a part of the bill which was not ruled out.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. We can not submit to that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the distinct understanding upon which that rule was drawn was that when the Committee on Appropriations proposed one of these amendments that was stricken out on a point of order, as we passed through the bill, an amendment thus offered would be subject to amendment under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in accord with that view, but understands that this is an entirely independent amendment and not something that was heretofore ruled out and not an amendment to anything that was ruled out.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The question of germaneness, of course, would remain.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand the amendment does not refer to any matter which is being put back into the bill under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I reserve the right to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the words "War Claims," in line 24, page 14, the words "Patents in lieu of session clerk authorized by law."

Mr. BURLESON. I understand the point of order is reserved on that.

The CHAIRMAN. This proposed amendment is directed to a portion of the paragraph to which no point of order was made when it was pending before the committee in the first instance. It is not authorized by the Committee on Appropriations, and it is not directed to that part of the bill covered by the rule at all. If this were to be opened to such an amendment it would open the whole bill that has been read to amendment.

Mr. CURRIER. It would open only the paragraph to which points of order were made.

The CHAIRMAN. The same principle would apply to every other paragraph.

Mr. CURRIER. I understand it would apply to those paragraphs which contain matters taken up by the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman would be correct if the entire paragraph had gone out, but in this instance only two items went out on a point of order.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? Is the paragraph only now complete, and when the paragraph is complete is it not subject to amendment when before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph was completed with one item taken out of it on a point of order. It would not be possible to go back to that paragraph except by unanimous consent had it not been for the special rule which the House adopted, and this amendment is not protected by that rule. It is not a provision heretofore ruled out nor an amendment to such a provision. Had the whole paragraph gone out on a point of order, then, upon a motion to reinsert it, the whole paragraph would have been open for amendment; but in this instance only certain items were objected to and ruled out, and the amendment does not relate to them. The Chair, therefore, must sustain the point of order. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, lines 22, 23, and 24, and in line 1, page 16, restore the following words, "and shall be subject to removal by the Doorkeeper at any time after the termination of the Congress during which they were appointed," and omit the matter previously inserted by amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, in line 11, after the word "Representatives," insert "$5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts, who moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what the salary of the Sergeant-at-Arms was last year?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Sergeant-at-Arms' salary was $4,500. We recommend $5,000, and do so for this reason: The Sergeant-at-Arms is compelled to give a bond which, I believe, costs about $300 a year. In addition thereto, the responsibility of the Sergeant-at-Arms has been considerably increased by the custom of Members of doing their banking business, paying their bills through his office. This is a custom that has grown up. Many Members do take advantage of it, and it entails a considerable amount of greater responsibility and work. In view of the bond provision, we felt that the salary should be raised to $5,000.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman, has a bond been required by law since the salary was fixed last year, or is it an old provision?

Mr. LITTAUER. The law has not been changed, nor has the compensation been changed for many years.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then there is no need for an increase, so far as the bond is concerned.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the bond was required immediately following the defalcation in the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. So that the bond was required when the salary was fixed at $4,500.

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes; but the practice of having a surety bond, or a bond that has to be paid for, has only lately come into general vogue.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. So that disposes of the first reason for the increase. We will now come to the second reason, namely, the practice of the Sergeant-at-Arms in doing practically a banking business. Let me ask if that practice was not in existence when the salary was $4,500 a year?

Mr. LITTAUER. We were advised that this privilege has increased greatly in late years.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. By what reason? By reason of there being additional Members in the House?

Mr. LITTAUER. Not particularly so, but by more Members taking advantage of the facility granted by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. But when the salary was $4,500 a year——

Mr. LITTAUER. The salary is now $4,500 a year.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes; and with a salary of $4,500 a year, the banking privilege was availed of by Members to a large extent, of course.

Mr. LITTAUER. It has been growing lately, and we felt that because of that practice, together with the cost of the bond required, was reason enough for us to increase this salary to $5,000.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The bond affords no reason for the increase, because the bond was required under the old law. Now, let me ask this question. Has there been a sufficient increase in the borrowing privilege to warrant the increase of $500 in salary?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I can only state that we believe that the Members of this House have taken advantage by a growing custom of doing their banking business through the Sergeant-at-Arms. Some men will draw from twenty-five to fifty checks at the beginning of the month in all kinds of amounts, which has entailed a good deal more work upon his office, and we felt that it was right that his compensation should be $5,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, line 23, after the word "Doorkeeper," insert "$4,500."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York what the Doorkeeper's salary was in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. Three thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And you have increased the compensation $1,000?

Mr. LITTAUER. We have submitted to the House an increase of $1,000, making this salary $4,500, and I will be pleased to give the reasons.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, will the gentleman tell the House the reason for this increase of $1,000?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Doorkeeper is one of the executive officers of this body. We found that there were five clerical assistants connected with the force of this House who received more than $3,500. We felt that the duties of the Doorkeeper, covering the various forces of the document room, the folding room, the janitor service, messenger service, etc.——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And elevator service.

Mr. LITTAUER. And general services of that kind, with which the House is thoroughly familiar, were worthy of a salary of $4,500. This salary has been $3,500 for many years. The present occupant of that position has been connected with the House for many years, promoted from an assistant's position to fill the important office of Doorkeeper. He fills it well. He came before us and described his work. We made comparisons with other services, and we felt we had a right conscientiously to report to the House a submission of $4,500 for this office, believing that the House, if its attention was called to it, would accept that figure.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It is for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to it, and because of criticism of the committee that I make the suggestion. Now, let me ask the gentleman if this official will perform any more services for the $4,500 than he did for the $3,500?

Mr. LITTAUER. Every Congress places a larger force under the Doorkeeper.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. For what reason? Why does Congress provide a larger force each time?

Mr. LITTAUER. I suppose because of the increase of business.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, will the gentleman tell me—the gentleman says that the Doorkeeper is raised a thousand dollars a year not because he performs a very much larger amount of service, but because he finds there are five clerks who get $3,500 and over?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, I said that was one of the reasons.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Because the Doorkeeper ought to get a thousand dollars more than those men?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think the Doorkeeper's services should be recompensed at a higher rate than those clerical services to which I referred.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. What I wanted to ask was whether you think this kind of clerical service was worth $3,500?

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, I do not care to answer the question. I do not believe the rates of compensation here are altogether based upon the value of services.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from New York, stating, as I do, I have not the slightest objection to the increase of a thousand dollars in the salary of the Doorkeeper and $500 for the Sergeant-at-Arms, making their salaries one $4,500 and one $5,000, why is the discrimination, wherein is the justification for discriminating against the Postmaster of the House, who only gets $2,500 a year, when his duties have increased quite as rapidly as have the duties of these other gentlemen?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe his duties have increased, but they are of an entirely different character.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And his salary now is only 50 per cent of that of the Doorkeeper.

Mr. LITTAUER. I feel that the Postmaster's duties are not in the same category with the duties of either the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Doorkeeper.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not in the same category——

Mr. LITTAUER. I mean by that his duties are of a routine character of work, whereas these other men have to use executive ability.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Are there any more routine duties on earth than the duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think there are.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What does he do?

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman knows what his duties are perfectly well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do. I know exactly what he does, and I do not object to the increase in his salary, but I do believe that is a discrimination against the lower-priced men, the smaller men under them, and these increases, I think, are not in a fair, square way of business. That is what I think.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "four," at the end of line 23, page 16, and inserting the word "three."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 23, page 16, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "three;" so as to read: "three thousand five hundred dollars."

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, from what explanation we have heard from the member of the committee having this bill in charge, that it must be evident that the present salary of $3,500 is ample for the Doorkeeper of this House. In the first place, there has been nothing brought to our attention to show any increase in his duties, any increased obligation. His duties are the same and will be the same as they have been in the past; and, in my judgment, it is not a sufficient reason for increasing his salary, to say that it is not in proportion to some other man's salary. It will not do to compare his salary with some one who is getting too much, and then say he is not getting enough.

The gentleman in charge of the bill has said that various other officers are under the control of the Doorkeeper. He gave that as one of the reasons, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, as to why this salary should be increased. But, Mr. Chairman, he has nothing particular to do so far as the janitor work is concerned. He don't scrub any floors, he don't clean any spittoons. He has nothing to do, even with respect to those men who are under him, except to see that the work is done, and the work he performs, in my judgment, is well paid for at the price of $3,500 a year.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it is the observation of those who have taken any pains to look into the duties of this man's office, that about the only thing he performs is to hunt up good places for favorites, for those that are in the inner circle; and that is about all he does do. And it seems to me that $3,500 a year is enough for that; and the people who get the jobs ought not to insist upon getting an increase paid to this gentleman who does their bidding. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Right on that point. If the gentlemen of the House are sufficiently active, and are successful in creating now places under this Doorkeeper, then, according to the reasoning, the gentleman from New York may rise in his place next year and ask that the salary be increased to $5,500, because there are more employees under him.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be a logical conclusion, I should think.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. And the inevitable consequence also.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, reducing this matter to a business proposition, simply taking into consideration the duties pertaining to this office, is it not evident to every man that $3,500 a year is ample pay for it, and would not thousands of men competent to do it and carry on the work properly, be willing to undertake it for $2,500 a year? I believe the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one statement in addition to what has been stated by the gentleman from New York as a reason for reporting this increase. The Doorkeeper of the House, as he said, is receiving less compensation, although an elective officer of the House, than five clerks of the House. He might have added two more. In fact, there are seven appointive clerks who receive more than he, none of whom are required to, or do, remain in Washington after the close of the session. The Doorkeeper of the House has 200 men in his employ who are engaged under the rules or by authority of this House. There is no other elective officer of the House with as much responsibility in respect to the service rendered to the House itself as the Doorkeeper has. He is here every month in the year. He must be here once a month, at least, and he must be here the greater part of each month in order to look after the laboring force that takes care of that part of the Capitol which the House has put under his exclusive jurisdiction. He has under him the force in the folding room, that takes care of all of the documents of the House; he has under him the document room and the janitor service. He also has under him the pages and all the messenger service of this House; and now, by the action of the House, he is charged with the responsibility of looking after the janitor force the year around. If a janitor fails to perform his duty in the interim between the close of one session of Congress and the beginning of the next session or next Congress, the duty is imposed upon the Doorkeeper of the House to look after that janitor force and, if necessary, dismiss them provided they are not doing their work properly. In view of all these facts, Mr. Chairman, we felt that the dignity of the office required and the duties of the office justified more compensation than he is now receiving.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the only additional reason advanced by the chairman of the committee for this increase is because of the alleged dignity of the office of Doorkeeper. This seems to be a new doctrine.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not say that was the only one. I mentioned in detail the increased responsibilities growing out of the action of the House itself and the demands for increased service.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes; but the responsibility was there before, and the only additional reason brought out by the gentleman was the dignity of the office of Doorkeeper. I never heard of this theory of the dignity of a Doorkeeper before, and I doubt if that gentleman is worth $1,000 more this year than he was last year on the ground that his dignity is greater this year than it was last year. Now, I do not know whether this small army of 200 employees ought to be employed regularly or whether the committee, acting within its duty, should cut down the army of 200 to 150.

Mr. LITTAUER. They are largely increased outside of the committee.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I do not believe that we ought to justify every increase of salary because we find that other abuses exist. If we are going to regulate the compensation of all the officers of this Government according to the standard of the incompetent and the overpaid in the service, then let us do so boldly upon that theory and say so; but if we are going to adjust the salaries of Government officers according to the value of the services rendered, then we ought to legislate upon that theory. Now, I believe that what the committee has done in many of these cases is not to attempt to obtain economy, but only equality. We had an example of that in the equalization of the salaries of the Capitol police. It was found there were three grades there, all performing the same service; some getting $900 a year, some $960, and some $1,020. Now, the committee, instead of trying to find out what the proper wage was for those officers, made an average, as a jury does frequently, though wrongfully, and gave them each $1,020. They did not consider whether $1,020 was the proper measure of reward for the services performed, but only whether as a mathematical proposition $1,020 would not equalize the salaries of these gentlemen, and in accomplishing that result they actually increased the total appropriation for these Capitol police $480, cutting down some and advancing others. Now, I do not believe that this House ought to legislate for the purpose of making equality, and lifting all salaries up to the standard of the drones and the incompetents who are highly paid, but that the committee ought to exercise its power and find out what is actually earned by these officers of the Government, and pay them according to the work they perform.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts in connection with the discussion about the great dignity of the position of Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives that the late Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, thirty years ago, in describing the dignity of that position, said that to be Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives was the next thing to being doorkeeper in the house of the Lord. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is an officer who performs duties that are not particularly onerous, and it is seriously proposed to give him a salary of $4,500 a year, within $500 of what the Congressmen themselves are paid. Members of this House, having an office of at least equal dignity, and also having many difficult duties to perform, get $5,000 a year. It is solemnly proposed that the salary of this Doorkeeper shall be advanced so that he will get $4,500, or within $500 of the compensation of the Representatives of the people in this House.

[Here the hammer fell.] [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. TAWNEY], if I understood him to say, or if I understood some other gentlemen to say, that there had been some reduction of salaries in this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; there have been.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What officers or employees have had their salaries reduced?

Mr. TAWNEY. There are 64 reductions in salaries and the number of offices has been reduced 376.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are there any reductions in the salaries of House employees?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In what House employees?

Mr. TAWNEY. In the police force.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And messengers and janitors?

Mr. TAWNEY. The House reduced the salaries of the messengers. The committee did not recommend that reduction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there any reduction in the salaries of the subordinate force of the Doorkeeper's department?

Mr TAWNEY. There is an equalization of salaries in the office of the Doorkeeper, in the document room, and in the folding room.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In the salaries of clerks and assistants under the Doorkeeper, what is the aggregate reduction?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am unable to say. There is no reduction in the gross amount appropriated for the service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do you mean that the reduction in the subordinates' salaries is made up by the increase in the Doorkeeper's salary?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; I don't mean anything of the kind. There was so much appropriated for service in the document room, and that has been divided among certain clerks at different salaries doing identically the same work. We have raised the salary of some men in the folding room and reduced the salary of others, so that they do identically the same work, and the aggregate appropriation is about the same as heretofore for their service, and the same is true in the document room.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The reason I asked the gentleman the question was that it had been suggested to me that there was a reduction in the salaries of the subordinates and an increase in the salaries of the superior officers, so as to make the aggregate the same.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is nothing of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. A parliamentary question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. What is the amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry; but without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NORRIS) there were—ayes 21, noes 70.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the amendment be amended by striking out "four thousand five hundred" and inserting "four thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 11, after the word "clerks," insert "one thousand five hundred." After line 13 insert as a separate paragraph, "For stenographic and typewriting service, to be expended by the chairman of the conference minority, $600."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 26, line 21, insert "stenographer and typewriter, $900."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to return to page 20.

Mr. BURLESON. We have not reached that page yet.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a misapprehension. The paragraph that the gentleman from Ohio wants to amend we have passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to page 20, and I move to amend lines 12 and 13 by striking out "two thousand five hundred" and inserting the words "three thousand." That is to increase the salary of the Postmaster of the House $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph that has just been read for the purpose of offering an amendment which he suggests.

Mr. HARDWICK. I object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not do that; we are trying to equalize some of these salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia withdraw his objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, line 16, insert as a separate paragraph, "For assistant laborers, under the direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $14,533.55."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, lines 9 and 10, insert "three examiners, at $2,000 each;" in line 11, after the word "three," insert "twenty-two clerks of class 2."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 35, line 1, after the word "dollars," insert "7 clerks, at $1,000 each;" and in line 3, after the word "messenger," insert "5 clerks, at $840 each;" and in line 4 insert "2 clerks, at $720 each."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 10 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to return to page 10 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman for what purpose?

Mr. HAUGEN. To equalize the salaries between the police force and the messengers—to make the salary the same—to make the salary $1,100.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman mean the messengers?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, we can not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia objects. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 35, line 7, after the word "board," insert "for one chief of division, $2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 36, in line 19, after the word "dollars," insert "clerk to the Secretary of State, $2,250."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 51, in line 16, after the word "thousand," insert the words "five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 62, line 18, after the word "teller," insert the words "and change teller," and in line 21 insert the words "one bookkeeper, $1,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 63, after line 6, insert the following:

"Office of assistant treasurer at Cincinnati: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; assistant cashier, $1,800; bookkeeper, $1,800; receiving teller, $1,500; interest clerk, and 5 clerks, at $1,200 each; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk and stenographer, $720; night and watchman, $840; night watchman, $900; day watchman, $600; in all, $23,810.

"Office of assistant treasurer at New Orleans: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; chief clerk and cashier, $2,250; receiving teller, and paying teller, at $2,000 each; vault clerk, $1,800; two bookkeepers, at $1,500 each; coin clerk, $1,200; 6 clerks, at $1,200 each; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; porter and messenger, $500; day watchman, $720; night watchman, $720; typewriter and stenographer, $1,000; in all, $28,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of page 65 insert:

"Office of assistant treasurer at Philadelphia: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier and chief clerk, $2,500; paying teller, $2,000; coin and paying teller, $2,000; bond and authorities clerk, $1,600; vault clerk, $1,900; bookkeeper, $1,800; assorting teller, $1,800; redemption teller, $1,600; receiving teller, $1,700; 2 clerks, at $1,500 each; 3 clerks, at $1,400 each; clerk, $1,300; 6 clerks, at $1,200 each; superintendent messenger and chief watchman, $1,100; 6 counters, at $900 each; 7 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $48,940."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the paragraph just read insert:

"Office of assistant treasurer at St. Louis: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier and chief clerk, $2,500; first teller, $2,000; second teller, $1,800; third teller, $1,600; assorting teller, $1,800; assistant assorting teller, $1,500; coin teller, $1,200; bookkeeper, $1,500; 9 clerks, at $1,200 each; 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 day watchmen and coin counters, at $900 each; night watchman, $720; 2 janitors, at $600 each; in all, $36,820."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to renew my request for unanimous consent. I think the objection will now be made, I am so informed, and I ask permission to propose an amendment to lines 12 and 13, on page 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph he has indicated for the purpose mentioned. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 12 and 13, page 20, strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon his amendment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not; the House understands the proposition.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the paragraph just read insert the following:

"Office of assistant treasurer at San Francisco: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; bookkeeper, $1,800; chief clerk, $2,000; assistant cashier, $2,000; first teller, $2,250; assistant bookkeeper, $2,000; coin teller, and one clerk, at $1,800 each; clerk, $1,500; clerk, $1,200; messenger, $840; four watchmen, at $720 each; and two coin counters, at $900 each; in all, $28,670."

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HAYES. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 67 strike out all after the word "dollars," beginning line 10, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 14, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Cashier, $3,000; bookkeeper, $2,250; chief clerk, $2,000; assistant cashier, $2,400; first teller, $2,250; assistant bookkeeper, $2,000."

Mr. HAYES. Now, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is not to increase the salaries of these officials, but simply to retain them at their present rate. The committee has seen fit to reduce the cashier, the assistant cashier, the bookkeeper, and the assistant bookkeeper; the cashier by $500, the bookkeeper by $450, and the assistants to these two officials $400 each. I have here a letter from the subtreasurer stating that these officials are old and trusted employees. They have been there in the service of the Government from twelve to eighteen years. They have never had an increase of salary, although the business of the office has more than doubled since they have been in office. It seems to me a little unusual at this time, when the cost of living is higher than it has been for many years, to reduce the salaries of these four men, to pick them out of all the employees of the subtreasury. I believe this is the only instance where salaries have been reduced, and I hope that the committee will——

Mr. TAWNEY. They are higher now than in other subtreasuries——

Mr. HAYES. I hear the gentleman from Minnesota say these salaries are higher than they are in other subtreasuries. They are the same that they have been for many years, and the reason why they were made higher, I presume, is that the cost of living in San Francisco is more than it is in the East. I have lived in both places recently, and I know this to be a fact. In the West nearly all that we consume has to be carried across the continent, usually overland, and the freight on it paid. I think it is unjust to single out these four trusted employees—faithful, competent men—in this way. If they resigned their positions, it would be almost impossible to replace them. I do not think it is fair to reduce their salaries while at the same time you are increasing the salaries of similar employees in New York, and, I think, in some other city. The Government has always recognized that it costs more to live in San Francisco than in other cities, and I can state, as a matter of fact, that these men are receiving no higher salaries than they would receive as employees of a bank or other large interest where they had the same responsibility and the same duties to perform.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, just one word of explanation. We found that the assistant treasurer at San Francisco claimed he needed more help. An investigation then led us into a comparison of forces. The assistant treasurer's office at Chicago is doing more than double the work that the office at San Francisco does. The compensation for total force appropriated for at Chicago is $68,000, whereas at San Francisco it is about $30,000. Now, the cashier at San Francisco has been paid $3,000, while this same officer, who performs double the amount of work, at Chicago only receives $2,500. The man occupying the same position at Baltimore gets $2,500; at Philadelphia, $2,500; at Boston he gets $2,500; and in Cincinnati and New Orleans, $2,250. We did not feel justified in continuing a salary at San Francisco higher than at these other places. Now, in respect to the bookkeeper at San Francisco, he receives $2,700, and at all the other places the salary is uniformly $1,800; and we recommended $1,800 again. This, in short, is the basis of our recommendation. Now, why a salary should be higher in San Francisco than in any other place I can not quite understand. I can not understand why the assistant treasurer's force should be paid a higher compensation and the joint force paid the same compensation at San Francisco in comparison with other cities. If one is entitled to a higher salary because of the cost of living, the other ought to be. I trust the committee recommendation will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HAYES. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 11.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], and the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 37.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 68, line 25, after the words "warrant clerk," insert "assistant weigh clerk."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Now, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 18, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I can not hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to recur to page 18, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 22, amend by striking out the word "two," where the word occurs in said line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTAUER. I will have to object—at least I will reserve my objection.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. The purpose of this amendment is to give to the special messengers of the House, Messrs. Sinnott and Felton Knight, $1,500. They each now get $1,200. That is the sole purpose of the amendment; it gives them $1,500 instead of $1,200.

Mr. LITTAUER. What do they do?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Theirs are very onerous duties.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe it would be right to increase the compensation of these messengers; and I therefore object.

Mr. PAYNE. Has not the bill been read and the amendments agreed to?

Mr. LITTAUER. It has now been completed. I will finish by asking unanimous consent that the Clerk may correct the different totals in the bill according to the different amendments that have been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to correct the totals in accordance with the different amendments agreed to. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BONYNGE. Before that is done, I ask unanimous consent that the last amendment be re-reported. I think there was an amendment to the last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York give way for that purpose?

Mr. LITTAUER. If the gentleman can point out an error I would be glad, indeed pleased, to correct it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 68, in line 25, after the word "warrant clerk," insert "assistant weigh clerk."

Mr. BONYNGE. Now, Mr. Chairman, there was one in lines 21 and 22. "Weight clerk, $2,000," was stricken out on a point of order. It was not reported, I think.

Mr. LITTAUER. I think the gentleman is correct; and I believe the bill ought to be amended in that particular.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that amendment?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do offer that motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 68, lines 21 and 22, insert the words "weigh clerk, $2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the other corrections made necessary by the amendments will be considered as ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16472—the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTAUER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HAZING AT THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy, with an accompanying statement, to be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rule.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution for the publication of eulogies delivered in Congress on Hon. John W. Cranford, late a Representative in Congress;

H. R. 5954. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate gold certificate, in lieu of one lost, to Lincoln National Bank, of Lincoln, Ill.; and

H. R. 16671. An act permitting the building of a dam across the St. Joseph River near the village of Berrien Springs, Berrien County, Mich.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill and joint resolutions:

H. R. 6216. An act granting an increase of pension to Stephen D. Hopkins;

H. J. Res. 127. Joint resolution to correct abuses in the public printing and to provide for the allotment of cost of certain documents and reports; and

H. J. Res. 128. Joint resolution to prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents.

FORTIFICATION OF PURE SWEET WINES.

Mr. NEEDHAM, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 15286) to amend existing laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the printing, without the accompanying map, of 1,000 additional copies of the message of the President submitted on March 27 with the report of the American members of the International Waterways Commission, together with the accompanying letters and memoranda.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the printing of 1,000 additional copies of the document to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the American Association of Commerce and Trade, of Berlin, relative to the advisability of placing woolen rags on the free list—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a draft of a bill for reservation of Grahams Island, in Devils Lake, North Dakota, for use of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians—to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation for participation in the Second International Peace Conference—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 31, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS IN ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up the bill (H. R. 16802) to fix the regular terms of circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama for consideration, but the reason I do not call it up is that a gentleman on the floor of the House [Mr. WILEY of Alabama] notified me if I did he would object.

BRIDGE ACROSS RAINY RIVER, MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill S. 4825, "to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainy River, in Minnesota;" substantially the same as a House bill reported and on the Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that is a matter that came through the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which recommended a substitute bill in accordance with the recent law that was passed, and I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the original Senate bill be dispensed with and the substitute offered by the House committee, the bill H. R. 15923, "to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainy River in the State of Minnesota," be read instead.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the substitute may be offered without reading the Senate bill, but the bill is not privileged under the rule. The bill is substantially the same as the substitute that was reported from the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is true, Mr. Speaker; but what the House committee did was to practically substitute the same thing, but refer to the recent law.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reading of the Senate bill will be dispensed with, and the gentleman from Minnesota is recognized to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the bill H. R. 15923 as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read the substitute at length.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BEDE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE OVER THE MONONGAHELA RIVER, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 9324.

The Clerk read the bill with the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TIME FOR HOLDING DISTRICT COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20) to change and fix the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee; in the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Chattanooga, and the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee at Greeneville, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee, held at Nashville, shall commence on the first Monday in May and October of each year instead of the third Monday in April and October, as now provided by law; and the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, held at Chattanooga, shall commence on the first Monday in April and December of each year; and the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the northeastern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, held at Greeneville, shall commence on the first Monday in June and November of each year; and each of said terms at each of said places shall continue so long as the presiding judge may deem necessary.

SEC. 2. That no action, suit, proceeding, information, indictment, recognizance, bail bond, or other process in either of said courts shall abate or be rendered invalid by reason of the change of time in the holding of the terms of said courts, but the same shall be deemed to be returnable to, pending, and triable at the terms herein provided for.

SEC. 3. That the clerks of said circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Tennessee may reside and keep their offices, respectively, in either the city of Knoxville, Chattanooga, or Greeneville; but said clerks shall each, respectively, appoint a deputy to reside and keep their offices in each of the above-named cities other than the one in which said clerks shall respectively reside and keep their offices; that the said deputy clerks shall, in the absence of their principals, do and perform all the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, the public welfare requiring it; and that all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BROWNLOW. The part of the bill, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague objects to—section 3—I move to strike from the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3 and renumber section 4 as section 3.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman moves to strike out sections 3 and 4.

Mr. BROWNLOW. No; section 3 is the one the gentleman objects to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROWNLOW, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4130) to authorize the Capital City Improvement Company, of Helena, Mont., to construct a dam across the Missouri River.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of the Government is hereby given to the Capital City Improvement Company, of Helena, Mont., its successors or assigns, to construct across the Missouri River, at some point between the south line of township 12 north, range 2 west, and the north line of township 14 north, range 3 west, Montana meridian, to be determined by them and approved by the Secretary of War, a dam, canal, and appurtenances thereof, for water power, and other purposes, and in connection therewith a foot bridge, or bridges, for public use: Provided, That the plans for the construction of said dam and appurtenant works shall be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before the commencement of construction, and when so approved no change shall be made in said plans without the prior approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided further, That whenever required to do so by the Secretary of War the said company shall construct and maintain in connection with said dam a suitable boom and log sluice; that suitable fishways, to be approved by the United States Fish Commissioner, shall be constructed and maintained in said dam by said corporation, its successors and assigns; and shall obtain and convey to the United States, whenever requested to do so by the Secretary of War, clear title to such land as in his judgment may be required for constructions and approaches to said dam for transferring boats and freight around the same, and shall grant to the United States a free use of water power for operating such construction work; and to insure compliance with these conditions the said company shall execute and deliver to the Secretary of War a proper bond in such amount as may be fixed by him: And provided further, That the said company shall be liable for any damage to private property resulting from the construction and operation of said dam and appurtenant works, either by overflow or otherwise, and proceedings to recover compensation for such damage may be instituted either in the State or Federal courts.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the structures herein authorized shall be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls for the regular order, and that is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Will the gentleman withhold his demand for the regular order until I can answer the question of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MAHON. I will withdraw the demand for the present.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman where is the proposed location with reference to Stubbs Ferry.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. It is 8 or 10 miles below Stubbs Ferry. There are two dams across the Missouri 5 miles above this point. It is about 200 miles farther up the river than any navigation has ever been had, and it is 1,000 miles farther up than any boat has ever been in the last twenty-five years. There is no possible chance for navigation at that point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will assure me that if this bill is debated he will withdraw it, I shall not object.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. I will give the gentleman that assurance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DIXON of Montana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ACCOUNTS OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, House bill 186, to authorize the readjustment of the accounts of Army officers in certain cases, and for other purposes, relates to all the officers in the Army up to a certain date—about 1880. It is the second bill on the Private Calendar. It belongs evidently on the Union Calendar, and I move it be taken from the Private Calendar and placed upon the Union Calendar. I make that as a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claims of officers of the United States Army, or of persons who may have served as such, and of the heirs at law or legal representatives of such as are deceased, for arrearages of longevity pay, are hereby referred to the United States Court of Claims, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to render judgment in all such claims, without regard to lapse of time, for the amount, if any, found due; and in the adjustment of such claims credit shall be allowed for the full time of service as cadets in the Military Academy at West Point, and as officers or enlisted men in the Army or Navy of the United States, Regular or Volunteer, or both.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York if he desires to be heard.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, some years ago Congress passed a bill allowing longevity pay, which was an increase of 10 per cent upon every officer who had served five years in the Army for each five years until an increase was made of 40 per cent. This bill was passed, and under it a large number of claims, of course, were made. In the first place, the claims were made without regard to service at West Point Military Academy, but afterwards some gentleman who was interested, I suppose, in framing the bill had put in some bills claiming that the service of four years at West Point was a part of the military service. These claims were brought before the Court of Claims and appealed and finally went to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court decided, and I think properly under the terms of the law, although it evidently was not contemplated by Congress at the time the law was enacted, that this claim of service at West Point should count, and the claims were allowed. But the court had allowed as a bar the statute of limitations and allowed the claims for only six years prior to the passage of the law. The date, I believe, was 1881, the law being passed in 1887. I may not be exactly correct about the year, but I think I am. That question went to the Supreme Court, and in the 130 U. S., page 80, the Supreme Court decided that the statute of limitation was a bar to these claims except for the six years immediately preceding the time of the filing of the claim.

Now, this thing was done and seemed to have been settled, and people settled down upon it, although I believe that one or two private bills have slipped through since then where the total longevity pay has been allowed. Now, this bill comes in here and provides these claims shall go to the Court of Claims, and the officers or their heirs may recover, and that the statute of limitations shall not be a bar to the recovery. It also provides in express terms that the service at West Point and also the service in the Volunteer Army shall count as a part of the time in order to make up the five years or the several five-year periods in order to get longevity pay. This applies, as I understand it, not only to the question of officers on the list, but when they retire it also increases the retired pay of these officers. In other words, it affects the great mass of officers of the United States Army from the beginning of time down to the present moment under the terms of this bill. All the officers in the Army and the heirs of those deceased may make claims under this bill, and it would seem that there would be no defense to it, either in the statute of limitations or anything else. Evidently this is a general bill, if any was ever brought in here. The distinction has been made by the decisions of the Chair and the decisions of the House more times than one that a private bill is one allowing a claim to a private individual. It has been extended, I believe, in one instance, to a battalion in the Army, where an honorable discharge was granted, a military record was corrected, or something of that kind, and that was a stretch of the rule. But to allow this to go upon the Private Calendar and to be considered as a private bill would be an annulment of the rule of the House which requires these general bills involving an appropriation from the Treasury to go upon the Union Calendar and be considered in their order when reached upon the Union Calendar. Therefore I make the motion.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I am not very familiar with this subject, but I am inclined to think the gentleman is mistaken in the statement that this law applied to officers, allowing them to count time in the volunteer service during the war. I do not think it did, unless at that time they were also holding rank in the Regular Army. Is not that the qualification?

Mr. PAYNE. There is no qualification in this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. But the bill relates to the Regular Army and would require a special provision to include a period of time when they were not in the regular service. There were many officers, Mr. Speaker, in the civil war and in the Spanish war, for that matter, who belonged to the Regular Army, who served in each of those wars with a volunteer rank higher than that they held in the Regular Army, and the volunteer service there would, of course, not be considered, because they were also in the regular service and entitled to an accounting, but if they served in the Volunteer Army without being in the Regular Army I do not think the bill includes that in computing the longevity time. I do not understand why this should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It is not an appropriation, because it is not intended to be anything more than a method of having the claim of each officer that would be covered by the bill go to the Court of Claims, there to be examined; therefore I think it is properly where it was originally referred, and I make the point that it is rather late to object to the place the bill has taken upon the Private Calendar. Now, a word about the statute of limitations. For a hundred and twenty-odd years we have talked here about a statute of limitations as to private claims, and we have never had one we recognized, and it is said now that we ought to recognize one against officers of the Army. We have made several, Mr. Speaker, against ourselves, and I expect that every Congress has broken it at once. We have referred claims to the Claims Commission and had them reported back, some of them disallowed, and afterwards paid parts of the claims. We have provided a statute of limitations and we have paid no attention to it, and I do not see why it should be applied now, for the first time, arbitrarily to officers of the Army.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman if he is not mistaken in his statement that the bar of limitation is not set up against claims generally in this House; if he does not know, as a matter of fact in the West, which unfortunately is not so largely represented in this body as to command the influence that its merits, intelligence, and character entitle it to, there are many hundreds of claims of citizens who fought to repel the savage Indians which are denied only because of the bar of limitation?

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman misapprehended my statement. I said we had passed a statute of limitation here against claims. They are referred sometimes to the Claims Commission, and when they report for or against them we pay no attention to our own statutes and reconsider the claims; and we have thousands of them pending here now that ought to have been paid, some of them fifty years ago. We pay no attention to our own statutes. We pass a statute and say we will not allow a claim after it is 10 years old, and the very next day after it is thus barred we introduce a bill to pay it, and sometimes it goes through, and——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman is getting entirely outside of his question.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I am answering the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, no one doubts the power of the House to waive the statute of limitations. There is no question about that.

Mr. KEIFER. And I am opposed to applying it to these officers of the Army arbitrarily for the first time.

Mr. PAYNE. The only thing that is germane to the question before the House is this, and I refer to clause 3 of Rule XXIII:

> All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payment out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, or referring any claim to the Court of Claims shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Rule XIII prescribes the Calendars and provides how they shall be made up.

Now, there is ample authority and precedents for this action, Mr. Speaker. I shall not refer to the precedents upon this point—I do not happen now to turn to the section in Mr. Hines's book which refers to that—but it is clear, and I presume the Speaker has it before him now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like two or three minutes on this question. The sole question is whether this bill——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman commences I want to cite a case which comes to my mind in the case of a bill affecting the Fourth Arkansas Cavalry Regiment, and the point being made, former Speaker Reed ruled that that was a general bill, and must go to the Union Calendar; and he so changed the reference in the open House, as I recollect it. Now I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the sole question is whether this bill is of a public character or whether it belongs to that class which, under the rules, belongs to the Private Calendar. There is no doubt that a bill proposing to abrogate the statute of limitations generally would be classified as a public measure. This bill proposes to repeal and abrogate the statute of limitations as applied to claims held by one entire arm of the Federal Government—all of the officers of the Army. All of the officers of the Army are affected by the provisions of the bill in relation to their longevity pay. It seems to me that in its very nature it is not of that class of bills contemplated by the rule that should go upon the Private Calendar. This is a public bill.

It proposes to abrogate the law, suspend the operation of the statute of limitations in the ascertainment of claims of all the officers of the United States Army—a whole class. If it may include the United States Army it might also include the officers of the Navy, and it might include an additional branch of public administration and yet retain its character as a private measure.

It seems quite clear that the bill is public in its character and is not a private bill; public because it applies without discrimination, without respect to individuals, to one entire branch of the Government.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which has been on the Private Calendar of this House in many Congresses. It has been considered as a private bill in the Senate and has passed the Senate as a private bill. It is not a bill that affects the general public at all. In 1838 the first longevity act was passed; so that it does not go back to time immemorial, as the gentleman from New York would have you believe. The first act was passed in 1838, which gave a ration for every five years' service. The purpose of the law was to encourage long service in the Army, and this was made a part of the pay of the officer. In 1867, or afterwards, the law was changed, and they were given 10 per cent of their salary every five years of their service.

Then there were different acts of Congress passed. An officer by the name of Morton claimed that his service at West Point was in the actual service of the Army of the United States. That case was well tried in the Court of Claims, where his position was affirmed, and by no less great judge than Judge Miller, holding that the service of an officer at West Point was actual service in the Army of the United States. Under that decision this officer was paid. Never until Comptroller Gilkerson came into that office, or since, has any Comptroller undertaken to set at defiance a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Another case was that of a man by the name of Captain Watson, a one-legged soldier, who had lost his leg in battle, and the Supreme Court, Justice Lamar delivering the decision, confirmed the previous decision in the Morton case. Then Comptroller Gilkerson refused to obey the Supreme Court and tied up the cases covered by this bill until he left his office. Another Comptroller came in, and from that day to this every man in the Regular Army of the United States has received his longevity pay. This class of men are old soldiers of the civil war. This bill covers cases of the widows of men like General Sherman, General Sheridan, General Hancock, General Reynolds, those magnificent officers who sacrificed and gave their lives to their country. Gilkerson came in as Comptroller, appointed to that position not as a lawyer, but as a politician, by political influence. He defied a great lawyer like Day, who made himself a great name in the State Department, resigned his position, and is now receiving a salary of $30,000—a man of great ability. The last man who was granted longevity pay was General Kilpatrick. Grant was allowed his pay. Rosecrans was allowed his pay. And then this gentleman, Gilkerson, came in and defies the Supreme Court. He allowed General Kilpatrick and then stopped. The record of every one of these claims is now in the Treasury Department.

These old officers who saved this Government are asking no charity at the hands of this Congress. They are simply asking that they be paid what this Congress gave them, and which was withheld by the unrighteous and brutal decision of Comptroller Gilkerson. But that is neither here nor there. This is not a general law——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Was the original law giving longevity pay to the officers in the Army a private law or a general law?

Mr. MAHON. That was a general law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why?

Mr. MAHON. Because there was no law on the subject at that time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But it only applied to the officers in the Army.

Mr. MAHON. But there had been no law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And this bill now proposes practically to abrogate the statute of limitations as to claims under that law.

Mr. MAHON. There is no statute of limitations in the Treasury Department, and never was.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Never was?

Mr. MAHON. Never was; and there is none there to-day.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will you tell me, then, why you include the provision in the bill practically abolishing the statute of limitations?

Mr. MAHON. There is no statute of limitations in the Treasury Department or in any Department; but this man Gilkeson held these people up and refused to allow these claims or to consider them. In the Court of Claims the statute of six years prevails, and that is the reason he held them up, because he knew when they got into the Court of Claims the statute could be pleaded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the gentleman from New York quote to me some authority showing that this is a general law. There are about eight or nine hundred of these men, and their claims are filed in the Treasury Department, ready for adjudication. It only applies to these private claims of these individual officers and not to the whole Army, because two-thirds of the Army have received what these men are asking for. It is not a general law that applies to the public service. It is simply a law that provides the machinery by which these claims shall be considered by the Court of Claims.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. This bill is not limited just to the claims that are already filed, is it?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE. What language in the bill limits it to any such class of claims? Why does it not apply to every soldier that ever served, from the Revolutionary war down to the present day, or to his heirs?

Mr. MAHON. Let the gentleman read the bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claims of officers of the United States Army, or of persons who may have served as such, and of the heirs at law or legal representatives of such as are deceased, for arrearages of longevity pay, are hereby referred to the United States Court of Claims, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to render judgment upon all such claims, without regard to the lapse of time, for the amount, if any, found due.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That does not confine it, however, to claims already filed. Anybody thinking he has a claim can file it, or can come in under this bill.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say to the gentleman that there are no claims outside of those already filed, because since this decision the officers have been paid. Every man in the Navy has received his full longevity pay. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this bill has always been, with one exception, upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman upon the point as to whether this is a public or a private bill.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, a bill was introduced in this House and placed on the Private Calendar to pension a battalion of volunteers, 400 men. These 400 men claimed that they should be pensioned. They were not under the general law, so the bill was introduced. That bill was held by the Speaker to be a private bill. We have passed bills here containing hundreds of individual claims, to send them to the Court of Claims, for payment for stores and supplies and for the use of property; single bills probably containing half as many individuals as are covered in this bill, and those bills have gone to the Private Calendar. Now, Mr. Speaker, if it has been held in this House that bills to pension 400 men, a whole battalion, was a private bill, pray tell me why a bill to adjudicate the claims of 800 of these old soldiers of the civil war is not also a private bill?

Now, this matter has been under discussion. In one decision, Mr. Hinds, in his book on parliamentary law, says that the rule is doubtful and that it is difficult to draw the line. But the line was drawn in favor of pensioning 400 men, and I want to know why the gentleman from New York wants to draw the line against a bill which seeks to do justice to these men. This bill has been on the Private Calendar before, and whether fortunately or unfortunately, it is the second bill on the Private Calendar to-day. That is the reason why the gentleman makes his motion. Give me an open field and a fair fight and if I can not convince the membership of this House that this is the most righteous bill ever put upon this Calendar I will yield.

The purpose of this parliamentary move is to deprive these old men of a hearing on this bill, and put it upon the Union Calendar. As was well said by the gentleman from Ohio, this motion has not been raised against other private claims, although we have had hundreds of them. It has not been raised against a regiment of militia. It has never been raised in this way. Why does the gentleman raise it now? Is he afraid to have this bill heard here? If he is honest, he will state his purpose, and that is to bury it. I am prepared to consider the bill openly and fairly without concealment of anything. Of course we have got to submit to the ruling of the Speaker, but I defy the gentleman from New York to quote me a single decision upon this point that specifically supports his position. It is one way to defeat a bill, but I want to serve notice on the gentleman from New York that it will not be the last one. I appeal to the Speaker that if there is any doubt about this decision, that he give these men the benefit of that doubt. We are not asking anything that is unfair.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak about five minutes in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. PRINCE. As I understand, the motion has been made by the gentleman from New York to refer this bill from the Private Calendar to the Union Calendar. I do not desire to argue the merits of the bill; that is another proposition. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXII, page 282 of the Manual, and I read it for the benefit of the House:

2. All other bills, memorials, and resolutions may, in like manner, be delivered, indorsed with the names of Members introducing them, to the Speaker, to be by him referred, and the titles and references thereof of all bills, resolutions, and documents referred under the rules, shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD of the next day; and correction in case of error of reference may be made by the House without debate in accordance with Rule XI on any day immediately after the reading of the Journal by unanimous consent.

The gentleman from New York, as I understand it, has invoked Rule XIII, but has not invoked Rule XI, that this refers to. Let us see what is the further provision this refers to. The rule further says:

Or on motion of a committee claiming jurisdiction, or on the report of the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred.

There is no authority whatever for the gentleman from New York to make the motion, because he is not a member of the committee that should take jurisdiction of it nor is the committee that reported it seeking to have it re-referred; but here is a bill properly introduced under the rules of the House and by the Speaker under the rule, who has the authority to refer, referred by him to the Committee on War Claims. That committee, in the discharge of its duty, has performed it and brought into this House this bill with a favorable report.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit the Chair, it seems to the Chair that this is not a question of the correct reference of a bill to a committee on a motion, but it is a motion to change the bill from the Private Calendar to the Public Calendar, and would come under Rule XIII—that is, if it comes at all.

Mr. PRINCE. That is, if it comes at all, but I question whether it comes at all, because under Rule XXII, paragraph 3, there is no authority for doing it. True it is the House can and sometimes does act in defiance of the regular rules and the special rules, but that is a matter of the power of the House. I do not question the power of the House to do what it pleases. Here is a bill introduced in an orderly manner, referred by the Speaker to the proper committee that he saw fit to refer it to—the bill has not changed from the day it was introduced up to this moment. It is the same bill it was when introduced, and the report does not show that it has been changed in any respect. It is on the Private Calendar, and was placed there, going into the hands of every Member of the House on the 9th day of January, 1906, and here it is the 31st of March, 1906, when for the first time a question of this kind is raised, when the gentleman from New York seeks to prevent the old soldiers who served their country in the time of peril from getting their pay.

If this motion prevails to put it into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, then the bill has gone to a "graveyard," and it is proper to get one of the little head markers the Government furnishes deceased old soldiers free of expense and place on the marker the words:

You each and all loyally and faithfully served your country in war, but when danger is all over and peace restored you are not entitled to receive your just dues.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. I have now at hand the book to which I referred—Parliamentary Precedents—and I read from page 762, section 1431:

A bill pensioning a battalion of volunteers had been held to be a private bill. On May 22, 1896, at a Friday evening session, Mr. Robert Neill, of Arkansas, moved the consideration of the bill directing the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension roll the names of all the honorably discharged surviving officers and enlisted men of Gray's battalion of Arkansas Volunteers.

Mr. SERENO E. PAYNE, of New York, raised the point that this was a general pension bill.

The Chairman sustained the point, and ruled that the bill could not be considered.

Again, on Friday evening, December 18, 1896, the bill came up and Mr. George W. Ray, of New York, raised the point of order.

Mr. Neill cited the bill to pension Powell's Missouri battalion, which passed as a private bill on March 1, 1891, and was included among the private laws.

Now, here are two large battalions that were pensioned by a private bill. To continue:

The Chairman said:

"The Chair finds that on the 22d of last May this identical bill was brought before the committee. At that time the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was in the chair. A point of order was made upon the bill by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and the point of order was sustained.

"Now, the Chair is inclined to think that if this question had not been already adjudicated this should be held to be a private bill, because it applies to a specific battalion or regiment—not to a class, but to the individuals in a certain military organization."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill applies to specific officers.

The SPEAKER. But, if the gentleman will allow the Chair, the bill that he is reading about applies to a battalion and not to a class.

Mr. MAHON. The bill that we are discussing now applies to certain Army officers who have been refused their longevity pay by an officer of the Department who did not understand his business—a specific class of men. This bill applies to certain individuals who have filed their claims in the Treasury Department. I continue:

"The Chair, being inclined to take a different view from the former ruling, will take the sense of the committee upon the question—will submit the question to the decision of the Committee of the Whole."

The committee thereupon overruled the point of order, and decided that the bill was private.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this House in the Committee of the Whole decided to overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, and decided that the bill was a private bill. Further—

A resolution sending a series of claims to the Court of Claims was held to be in order on the Private Calendar.

Now, Mr. Speaker, must we get into the bark and split hairs? I take the position that this is not a class of men generally. They are men who have filed their individual claims in the Treasury Department, and they are individual claims, and, under the decision of this House, it is held that it was a private bill, to which I have just made reference, and this bill under discussion is exactly the same kind of a bill. I am going to be frank about this and say that there are eight or nine hundred of these officers who have been denied their money, and it will take from five to seven hundred thousand dollars to pay them in the course of the next four or five years. But they are claiming as individuals. Their claims are filed as individuals, and this bill covers those claims in the Treasury. I trust, Mr. Speaker, if there is any doubt about it that under the decisions I have just quoted that doubt will be resolved in favor of holding that this is a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves to change this bill from the Private Calendar to the Union Calendar. The objection is made, as the Chair understands, that the motion does not present a question of privilege, and therefore is not in order. Now, Mr. Speaker Randall held, and, as the Chair thinks, correctly, that such a motion does present a question of privilege. It seems to the Chair, however, that if the bill be a private bill it is on the right Calendar. If it be a public bill, then it ought to go to the Union Calendar, under the rules. The Chair has followed the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] in his citation of precedents.

Under Rule XIII there are three Calendars. There is a Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, which carries bills raising revenues, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character directly or indirectly appropriating money or property. There is a House Calendar, to which are referred all bills of a public character not raising revenue or directly or indirectly appropriating money or property. And there is a Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House to which are referred all bills of a private character. The practice is that the Journal clerk, under the direction of the Speaker, shall refer the bills to the respective Calendars as they come from the committees. In point of practice the Journal clerk, with the assistance of the clerk at the Speaker's table, makes these references unless the matter is specifically called to the attention of the Speaker. The same principle applies in the reference of bills that are introduced by Members and come through the basket. Now, this bill when it was introduced, as the Chair finds on consulting the Journal, was referred as a public bill; but when it was reported back from the committee the Clerk placed it, as it seems to the Chair if it be a public bill, inadvertently, upon the Private Calendar. So, that after all, it becomes a question of fact whether it is a public or a private bill within the rules and precedents. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] in his statement is probably correct from the standpoint of the rules as they were prior to the Fifty-fourth Congress; but at that time, on the suggestion of Representative Dingley to the Committee on Rules, an amendment was made to Rule XXIII, section 3, so as to add to the words "all motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people," etc., "or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property," the following: "or referring any claim to the Court of Claims." The effect of this is that such bills, under the rules, go to the Committee of the Whole.

Now, as to whether it be a public or a private bill. The Chair reads from Parliamentary Precedents of the House, as follows:

The line of distinction between public and private bills is so difficult to be defined in many cases that it must rest on the opinion of the Speaker and the details of the bill. It has been the practice in Parliament, and also in Congress, to consider as private such as are "for the interest of individuals, public companies, or corporations, a parish, city, or county, or other locality." To be a private bill it must not be general in its enactments, but for the particular interest or benefit of a person or persons. A pension bill for the relief of a soldier's widow is a private bill, but a bill granting pensions to such persons as a class, instead of as individuals, is a public bill, etc.

Now, treating this bill by the test, if the House will give the Chair attention, let us read it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his argument, assumes that this would cover about 800 people; assumes that it is under a certain law. After all that is an assumption. It may be correct or may not, and the Chair is not informed. The bill is as follows:

That the claims of officers of the United States Army, or of any person who may have served as such—

So it covers persons who have served as officers, although they may not have been officers regularly—and of the heirs at law or legal representatives of such as are deceased, for arrearages of longevity pay, are hereby referred to the United States Court of Claims and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to render judgment in all such claims, without regard to the lapse of time, for the amount, if any found due; and in the adjustment of such claims credit shall be allowed for the full time of service as cadets in the Military Academy at West Point, and as officers or enlisted men in the Army or Navy of the United States, Regular or Volunteer, or both.

Now, this bill not only refers the cases to the Court of Claims, but it legislates, removing the statute of limitations upon all claims, if such exist, from the organization of the Government to the present time. As a matter of fact, whether such claims are in existence in the hands of assignees or administrators the Chair is not informed. The Chair only knows of this bill upon its face. Nor does it apply in its terms to claims on file, if they be on file in the Treasury Department. It would cover claims, if such exist, although they may never have been filed or made under the provisions of the bill. It is not like unto the case where legislation was had for the relief of a battalion, mentioning the battalion, because there was a roster, a specific number of people to be covered by the bill. This bill relates to a class; it legislates; it removes the statute of limitations; it credits services in the militia, as well as in the Regular Army; it covers officers who were never mustered in, if they acted as officers. It seems to the Chair that if this is not a public bill, it would be difficult to conceive of one, and therefore the Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is in order.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, to change the reference from the Private Calendar to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to make any objection——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order on this motion?

Mr. KEIFER. No; I rise for an inquiry. I want to know whether the effect of the motion, if it should prevail, would be to put this bill at the end of the Calendar to which it ought to have been referred in the first instance?

Mr. MAHON. It does not make any difference where it puts it.

The SPEAKER. It would take its place on the Calendar as of the date of its report from the committee. The question is on transferring this bill from the Union to the Private Calendar.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MAHON. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 37.

So the motion to transfer was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar under the rules. The Clerk will report the first bill.

THOMAS W. HIGGINS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1572) for the relief of Thomas W. Higgins.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1572) for the relief of Thomas W. Higgins.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the sum of $350, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas W. Higgins, late major, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, for the loss of two horses.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read as follows:

After the word "horses," in line 8, insert "killed in battle during the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

DAVID C. M'GEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6530) for the relief of David C. McGee.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6530) for the relief of David C. McGee.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to David C. McGee, late private In Company I, Fiftieth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, out of any money the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $165, in full of his claim for balance due him as bounty by reason of reenlistment in the United States Army during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to give to David C. Horace the bounty due him of $165, which he never received. I think there is absolutely no objection to the passage of this bill. This soldier enlisted September 16, 1861, for three years, served two years and nearly ten months, and under the act of July 22, 1861, he would be entitled to a bounty of $100. Then, on January 1, 1864, he reenlisted in the same regiment as a veteran volunteer, to serve for three years. Under that enlistment, according to joint resolution of January 13, 1864, if he served his time, or was wounded in battle or in line of duty, or his services were no longer needed, he would be entitled to a bounty of $400, making $500 in all. On October 5, 1864, at Altoona, Ga., this soldier was wounded, a bullet going through his jaw, fracturing his jaw and lacerating his tongue. He was sent to the hospital at Davenport, Iowa. He was discharged at this hospital July 6, 1865. A short time before his discharge his regiment went home and were discharged, and all received this extra $400 bounty. This soldier was discharged July 6, 1865, on the suggestion of a Member of Congress from Iowa, who suggested that if he made a request by petition he could see that he was discharged. On that request he was discharged. The only reason that the War Department has not paid this soldier is that the records of the War Department do not show that he was discharged on account of wounds received in line of duty, which was the fact. Upon all rules of justice and right this man is entitled to this $165. He ought to be served the same as the other members of the regiment. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any doubt that he was discharged on account of the wounds?

Mr. OTJEN. There is not. He wss in the hospital, and it was an oversight that it was not so stated when he was discharged. There was no doubt of his having been wounded in line of duty.

The bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES N. ROBINSON AND SALLIE B. M'COMB.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10610) for the relief of James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10610) for the relief of James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, to James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb, of Johnson County, Ind., on account of damages sustained by them because of the wrongful confiscation by the United States of 335 acres of land and $300 in promissory notes, all the property of the said James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb, and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated for such purpose.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman ought to explain that bill.

Mr. MAHON. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been introduced and reported in six different Congresses, and for twelve years I have been waiting for it to be reached on the Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. You seem to have gotten there now.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I hope the gentleman from New York will let me explain in two minutes this bill, which is a reimbursement in a very slight degree of these people, who were minors in 1862, when the Government confiscated 335 acres of land and promissory notes amounting to several hundred dollars because they were in rebellion against the Government. They happened to be grandchildren of a citizen of Virginia, and while residing temporarily with their grandparents in Virginia the United States court in Indianapolis, under proper proceedings, I presume under the statute, instituted proceedings of confiscation. The facts show that these parties were not only at the time minors, but they and their people were loyal citizens. The 335 acres of land would amount in value to many times the amount carried in this bill. The interest upon the notes confiscated would amount, perhaps, to an equal sum to this amount; but rather than go into a complicated method of appraisement of the value of the land and the interest accumulated upon the notes confiscated, the committee, in my judgment, has wisely presumed a lump sum, a sum amounting to the $5,000 carried in the bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, the confiscation and the loss of this property which the Government confiscated——

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the Government did not undertake to confiscate the fee, but only the life use of this property.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is true; but these children of 1862 are now grown, and one of them particularly, getting pretty old, never got any of it back.

Mr. PAYNE. They have had time to grow, of course, since then. On what evidence did the court come to the conclusion that they were disloyal, and so forth, in 1862?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The facts show that it was upon default, but that they never had notice.

Mr. PAYNE. Was there no proof whatever?

Mr. OVERSTREET. According to the facts shown, it appears that the petitioners in no wise aided, abetted, or gave any encouragement to the rebellion, but were loyal citizens. By reason of the confiscation proceedings they have incurred great loss and expense in recovering possession of their lands, to the extent of over $12,000, lost in the sale of the notes, the rent of the land, and in cases in action. The committee are of the opinion that the proceedings in said libel suit were irregular, illegal, and void, in view of the petitioners being minors, orphans, and loyal citizens, and that they are entitled to a reasonable compensation for the loss which they have suffered. I am of the impression that it was clearly shown in the evidence that there was no notice given to them at all and they were not represented at the trial by anybody.

Mr. PAYNE. I infer that they testified themselves.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; they were not there.

Mr. PAYNE. The report shows that they testified that they had no notice. It was rather a general finding of the committee that the proceedings were irregular and void.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That was the finding on all the evidence.

Mr. PAYNE. The committee does not enlighten us as to the question on what evidence the court acted, as to service of notice, or disloyalty, or anything of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the bill recites the residence of those persons. They have since changed their residence to an adjoining county.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That will make no difference.

Mr. PAYNE. You had better amend it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move to amend by striking out the word "Johnson" in lines 6 and 7 and inserting the word "Marion."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, to be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out "Johnson" and insert "Marion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

S. D. SPRINKLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution 136; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 6948) for the relief of S. D. Sprinkle, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection, I ask that the resolution be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman ought to give a word of explanation to the House on that.

Mr. MAHON. There are a great many of these bills on the Calendar, and the House is entitled to an explanation. Probably twelve or thirteen hundred bills are sent to the Committee on War Claims asking for a direct appropriation. The evidence on these bills, or a great deal of it, is ex parte. The committee can not investigate all of these cases, but they examine the ex parte evidence accompanying these bills, and if the committee (they have been unanimous) believe that a strong prima facie case is made out that the Government took the property of these people for the use of the Army of the United States, then in lieu of recommending a report making a direct appropriation the committee has decided to report all these bills back to the House with a resolution in lieu of the bill referring all these claims with the papers to the Court of Claims. After the war the Congress was flooded with claims of this kind and so were the Departments.

There are a great many of these claims now in the Departments undecided, the Departments having no appropriation and no time to adjudicate them.

Congress could not investigate all of these claims, nor could the Committee of the Whole House when in session. So two laws were passed—the first known as the "Bowman Act" and the second as the "Tucker Act"—which created a court of six judges learned in the law, and provided that these matters should be referred to them. The court hear these claims, not on ex parte testimony, because they do not receive that except for what it is worth, but when the cases are called the court tries them usually on depositions, interrogatories and answers to the same, and cross-interrogatories prepared by the legal officers of the Government, and answers to the same. Many of these people live thousands of miles away from the seat of government and can not come here. When they live near they generally come. In these investigations the United States Government is represented by one of the assistant attorneys from the Attorney-General's Office, and the claimant is generally represented by his own counsel. After a full hearing in open court before the learned judges they make what we call a "finding of facts."

They do not render judgment; they simply find the facts and report them back to the House or Senate. All that go from the House will be referred back to the Speaker by the court. They will say, "We find so and so was loyal"—that is a jurisdictional fact. If the claimant failed to prove his loyalty, that is the end of the case. They further find that the United States Army, not on account of vandalism or destruction by troops, but the Army received a certain amount of goods, horses, corn, or anything else, and the court ascertains as to whether they were loyal, how much the Army officers took from them, whether it was used by the Army, and its value; and then the court reports back to the Speaker, and we call them "findings of facts." They are referred to the Committee on War Claims or to the Committee on Claims, wherever they belong, and we come into the House and ask for an appropriation.

Now, there are hundreds of claims here all founded on ex parte evidence, the strongest kind of evidence, and we believe they are such claims as the court should adjudicate. I want to say to the House that it need not be alarmed, because we have got a good court and the Committee on War Claims knows what is going on at the Court of Claims. During the past six years the aggregate amount of claims—some for $1,000, some for $200, some refused altogether—the aggregate amount of all those claims allowed was only 3½ per cent of the aggregate amount of the claims. The court has rejected and reduced some of them. A great many claimants refuse to appear and prosecute their claims, especially if there is any weakness in their claim, and perhaps they are not able to find the proof outside of ex parte evidence, and then the claim goes to the wall.

I believe, gentlemen, that this is a proper way to dispose of nine-tenths of all these claims. Out of the 3,000 bills we have only got 25 or 30 for direct appropriation on the Calendar. I make this statement because I do not want to repeat it and I will not repeat it. The balance of the bills are all exactly like this, no weaker and no stronger.

Mr. PAYNE. Let me ask the gentleman this question: This reference does not waive any statute of limitation; they are obliged to find the facts constituting the bar to the suit?

Mr. MAHON. The court looks over the facts and reports the facts back to Congress, and if they are of such a character that they ought to be paid the House can pay them, and if not, it can refuse.

It has been the custom heretofore to put these bills on the Calendar and then bring in a resolution—what we call an "omnibus resolution"—containing 150 or 200 different claims; but the trouble has been that when we get it into the House it is amended, and you will find two or three hundred claims loaded onto the resolution that the committee never passed upon. I do not think that is good legislation, and so we have put every one on its own bottom.

Now, this short report gives the amount of the bill—I think this is $282. I would like to see these resolutions pass and save time. I want to say this: There is a mistaken idea in the country, and perhaps in Congress, in regard to these private claims. There is no party or corporation or government that a man can hold a claim against where he will receive as cold treatment and as little consideration as he will for a claim he may hold against the Government of the United States. Being far away from the seat of government, he is put to enormous expense, besides the delays incident to Congress, of which I am not complaining.

It is a hard thing for even an honest claimant to get a claim from the United States. Mr. Garfield, when a member of the House, said that this House and Senate if they got the same treatment meted out to them that a man did in private life—the Congress, the Senate and the House, not its members—would have a striped suit on and be in some penal institution.

Now, we do not need to get frightened. During the civil war the line between the hostile armies was over 3,000 miles long. The Army of the United States frequently found itself in a territory without wagon train or supplies, and they deliberately and properly would go to a man's house, take what corn and horses they wanted, loyal though he was, give him a voucher for it, the officer expecting under the proclamation of the President that they would be paid for it. Now, do you wonder that four years of war made many claims? My little county of Franklin, with a population of 38,000 people during the war, had 160,000 men encamped on it at that time. We have paid since the end of this war about $16,000,000 to private citizens for property taken and used by the Army of United States. That money has been paid by hammering at the doors of Congress. I would just as soon personally solicit the influence of the devil to settle a church fight as to try to settle a private claim of mine in one of these Departments. You get no consideration, and the people are driven to Congress. So we have appropriated since the war closed forty-five years ago about $16,000,000. That is not a large sum.

After the Franco-Prussian war, when France was defeated and humiliated, driven almost to the verge of bankruptcy, with that enormous indemnity she had to provide, she at once sent a commission along the lines of the army and took account of the property taken by the French army and destroyed and the property taken by the German army and destroyed that belonged to her people, and in less than fifteen months France paid those people along the border lines, not one-twentieth as long as ours—with all her financial distress, she paid her people $21,000,000.

We have paid about sixteen millions in forty-five years. Even England, when the Revolutionary war closed, sent a commission over to this country, and every man who had remained loyal to the Crown had his losses paid, whether destroyed by the Revolutionary soldiers or by the English troops, and at that time England paid eleven millions of dollars to the people of this country who remained loyal to the Crown. The Governments of the world to-day are not holding to the old law of the days of semibarbarism, but they are operating upon the doctrine that those who defended the government in its hour of peril, if they suffered any extraordinary loss, should be reimbursed by the government whose duty it was to protect them or make good the loss. Why, Mr. Chairman, give me a commission and give me $15,000,000 and I will wipe off the face of the earth every war claim growing out of the civil war. I have made this statement for information of the House, and I am not going to detain the committee any longer. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I want to detain the committee for five minutes or so. I am in favor of the United States Government paying every debt that it owes. I only wish there was some way that we could stop at the honest debts, but the difficulty is that these claims come to Congress after the party has had his day in court, usually, or else after the statute of limitations has run against him, and generally a long time after, so that the facts about the transaction are generally dead. I am not finding fault with the Committee on War Claims or with the Committee on Claims. The very nature of this thing makes their duty rather a hazy one, and they can not get down to the exact certainty that a court may, and courts are not always certain, in rendering judgment upon claims. What I do find fault with is that after a claim has been settled by the proper tribunal, sometimes by a court and sometimes by an auditor under a general law provided for by Congress, and the claimant has got his pay, he comes in for a second or a third time, and comes before the House on ex-parte evidence and then the claim goes before the committee and the committee looks it over and thinks clearly it ought not to be paid; and then the Committee on Claims has been in the habit of simply putting a claim back in the pigeonhole, because the clever representative who has presented the claim does not like to be turned down with an adverse report. It seems to me, and I have been contending this for a good many years, that it is the duty of the committee in every such case to put the facts upon the record, so that the future committees could know just what this committee found and just what the evidence was when it investigated.

I understand from the chairman of this committee that they are mending their ways in that respect and inaugurating a new régime at this session of Congress, and that they are reporting with recommendations that the claim do lie upon the table, stating the facts in the case which, in their judgment, bar the claim or constitute the defense to the claim on the part of the United States Government. I think that we are aided a good deal in the future. As I said in the beginning, I want the honest claims paid. I want to be satisfied, however, that they are honest and then I have no objection to them. I think sometimes we set precedents here which make a sort of law; we go out of the way and outside of principles, or for lack of princedents, because of sympathy, and set a precedent that rises up to bother us in the future and a great many claims get into the second class and are afterwards paid. There are some on this Calendar that are fully justified by precedent that I have opposed in the past, but the House has run over me very good naturedly, as they sometimes do on claims day, because the gentlemen are here who have introduced the bills and who are personally interested in that way, and, of course, they look with keener perception in judging of the merits of these claims, and always see the merits in them a great deal more clearly than some of us people who do not have claims before the committee. So I have been often run over in this way, when no precedent is set, and, unless it is too awfully bad, I sit back and let the play go on. I am glad that this committee has concluded to do that, and I have also been informed that the committee on Claims is going to do the same thing. I think that hereafter we will not find cases coming in here where people have been paid twice and are asking for a third claim and sometimes a fourth after their claims have been settled and fully adjudicated and the proper amount has been paid. I have no objection to this reference whatever.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that it is a rule of the committee that no bill which has been paid or partly paid or adjudicated and determined adversely is ever reported by it, and such claims are not upon the Calendar. I want to say, further, that an expert clerk of the Committee on War Claims has been at work—and he has been during the fourteen years I have served on said committee—on a publication which will comprise perhaps four volumes, and for which we are going to ask this House to give us $3,000 to print for the use of the House and the Senate and the courts. He has carefully prepared a compilation of every claim that has been made against this Government since and prior to the Revolutionary war. The claims have all been classified—Quartermaster's Department, Commissary, or wherever they have been—what has been done with them. We will have a complete and accurate history of every claim ever made against this Government up to the present time. That book would have been published some four or five years ago, but he is now preparing the Spanish war claims, so when the work is published Congress will have it in its power at any time to send to the Library and in a few moments get the history of each and every claim.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JAMES P. BARNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9877) for the relief of James P. Barney.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James P. Barney, late first lieutenant and battalion adjutant of the Third Regiment United States Volunteer Engineers, the sum of $247.63, to reimburse him for that amount of public funds stolen from him, without his fault or neglect, in September, 1898, at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., which funds he accounted for and paid over, notwithstanding said loss, to Maj. Willoughby Walke, as required by law.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think that bill ought to be explained.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill, and have no personal knowledge of the character of the claim, but the report of the committee sets out very fully the history of it:

James P. Barney was, in the month of September, 1898, first lieutenant and senior battalion adjutant in the Third United States Volunteer Engineers, stationed at Jefferson Barracks, Mo. C. H. Hamilton was first lieutenant-adjutant of said regiment. On the —— day of September, 1898, Lieutenant Hamilton obtained a seven days' leave of absence. Upon his departure, Lieutenant Barney assumed the duties of adjutant of the regiment. Before departing upon his leave, Lieutenant Hamilton delivered to Lieutenant Barney $247.63 in public funds, representing coffee money issued to recruits by Maj. Willoughby Walke, of the same regiment, who was recruiting for the regiment in the South, for which sum Lieutenant Barney receipted.

The regiment was then living in tents, and the Government provided Lieutenant Barney with no safe or other means of keeping the money in his possession. Lieutenant Barney thereupon placed said money, with other money and jewelry of his own, in a locked metal box, and that box he placed in his trunk in his tent and carefully locked the trunk. The tent was guarded, and in the opinion of your committee Lieutenant Barney exercised reasonable and proper care in thus placing said funds.

Lieutenant Barney dined with the colonel of the regiment the day he received the money aforesaid. Upon his return to his tent, about 10 o'clock that night, he found that thieves had entered the tent, broken open his trunk, scattered its contents upon the floor, and taken away the locked tin box which contained the money. He promptly reported the theft to regimental headquarters, and detectives were employed, who, after a thorough investigation and search, were unable to ascertain the thief. Suspicion rested upon a servant in the officers' mess, but no evidence was procured upon which he could either be arrested or convicted. A week later the tin box was discovered in a ravine about 2 miles from camp. It was broken open, and its contents had been abstracted. Payment of a check which was in the box was stopped and a duplicate thereof obtained.

In his settlement subsequently made with Maj. Willoughby Walke, Lieutenant Barney accounted for the $247.63 stolen from him and paid it over to Major Walke, as required by law.

That is all there is of the case.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZA A. FIELDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 138.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 7753) for the relief of the estate of Eliza A. Fielder, deceased, and Benjamin L. Fielder, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, this is referred to the Court of Claims, and I think no further discussion is necessary; and I move that the resolution be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

LEE ROBBINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 139.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 10201) for the relief of Lee Robbins, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The question was taken, and the resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

COMPAGNIE FRANÇAISE DES CÂBLES TÉLÉGRAPHIQUES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9569) for the relief of the Compagnie Française des Câbles Télégraphiques.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid on the table and Senate bill 2872 be substituted in its place.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That can not be done in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed, as an act of grace and comity, to pay the Compagnie Française des Câbles Télégraphiques, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $77,712, being for expenses incurred in repairing its cables and property, which were cut and damaged by forces of the United States in Cuba during the Spanish-American war.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think we should have some explanation of this.

Mr. HASKINS. This bill provides for the reimbursement of the French Trans-Atlantic Cable Company for a cable which was cut and damaged by the military and naval forces during the Spanish war, and also for the destruction of two of their cable houses, with instruments therein, having been shelled by our artillery. This matter was brought to the attention of Mr. Hay by the French ambassador very early, and he presented a claim amounting to $86,300. Secretary Hay required of the French ambassador that he present a detailed account of the damages suffered or rather expenses incurred in repairing the cable, which had been cut in twelve different places and portions of which were destroyed, and also in regard to the cable houses that had been destroyed. A detailed statement was presented by the ambassador amounting to $77,712. This matter was brought to the attention of Congress early by President McKinley in a special message claiming that it was an international obligation on the part of this Government to reimburse the French company for the damages which they had sustained.

A bill was introduced and reported favorably by the Committee on War Claims in the Fifty-seventh Congress, again in the Fifty-eighth Congress, but they were not reached for consideration. In the Fifty-eighth Congress Secretary Root brought the attention of Senator ALLISON to the matter, and a provision, providing for the reimbursement to the amount of $77,712, was inserted in the deficiency bill of that year. When it came over to the House it was stricken out. The Committee on War Claims of the House have made a unanimous report in favor of the passage of this bill. The Senate Committee on Claims also made a favorable report, and a bill has passed the Senate, come over to the House, was referred to the Committee on War Claims, has been reported to the House, and it now stands upon the Calendar; and when the House convenes, if this bill is favorably acted upon by the Committee of the Whole, I shall move to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill. This matter has been urged upon the Committee on War Claims by letters from President Roosevelt and Secretary Elihu Root at this very session. They believe that it is time that this matter was settled as a matter of international comity and friendship between this Government and the French Government, and that we should make provision for the payment of the claim.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman why is was not adopted in the House when it came over on the deficiency bill?

Mr. HASKINS. I do not know. It was struck out in the conference report, as shown by the Senate document.

Mr. MAHON. They struck it out.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that, as a matter of national comity, where there is a war between two other nations, and the property of a neutral nation was destroyed, one of the parties to that war has to pay for it?

Mr. MAHON. It is suggested by the Secretary of State.

Mr. PAYNE. I am not prepared to deny that it is an act of friendship at all, but it seems to me a little unusual why a corporation having a building or property destroyed should not take the same chances of war as the people of France would take if they were private individuals.

Mr. MAHON. There is nothing allowed for the loss of business. That would amount to over $150,000.

Mr. PAYNE. I am not opposing the bill, but I understand the gentleman is urging it as a matter of international comity.

Mr. MAHON. The State Department has been pressing it for the last four or five years.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not mean to be understood as objecting to the bill, but I would like to know whether there is any legal basis for this claim. We do not pay for ordinary private property which we damage in case of war. Why is this private property different from other private property?

Mr. MAHON. The Secretary of State does not claim that we are under any legal obligation to pay the claim, but that we are under an equitable obligation, an international obligation, as between this Government and a neutral government during our war with Spain.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Do you mean if any damage were inflicted on any property of a French citizen in Cuba that we ought to pay for that?

Mr. MAHON. We will cross that bridge when we get to it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to know why this is differentiated from other cases. I would like to know the views of the committee in reporting it.

Mr. MAHON. There is no law—international law—but it is an act of comity between the nations. We paid the English companies. It is put upon the ground of friendship, and that this company should be treated the same as we treated the British companies:

> In this case, as in the instance of similar claims preferred by British companies, it is held as a general proposition and as a matter of right neutral telegraphic cables are exposed to the same vicissitudes in time of war as other neutral property, a proposition which finds conventional confirmation in the fifteenth article of the convention signed at Paris March 14, 1884, for the protection of submarine cables, which article provides that the stipulations of that convention shall be understood to affect in no wise the liberty of action of belligerents. It is, however, unnecessary to discuss this point as a proposition of right according to the consensus of international authorities, inasmuch as the Government of the United States is disposed, as far as its constitutional limitations permit, to regard claims of this nature from the point of view of equity. In two instances arising from injuries to foreign-owned cables during the war with Spain the President has been pleased, as a matter of gracious equity, to recommend to Congress the favorable consideration of their claims for actual damage suffered.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. What is the reason? That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. MAHON. This is the reason specified here. We had destroyed these cables. It was a momentous thing for the Government of the United States that these cables should be destroyed.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. We were down there in a foreign country; we were not in the United States, but we were in Cuba; and we destroyed these cables so as to prevent their use by Spain.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But we destroyed a great deal of other personal property down in Cuba. Do you think we ought to pay for it?

Mr. MAHON. Now, suppose we were at war with another country. Suppose we were at war with England or with Germany, and we cut some cables that might be worth millions of dollars. It might be worth millions of dollars to us, and we would destroy them as an act of war, for our protection. Why, of course, this Government would be responsible to them, and to see that they should be paid for.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not quite understand the gentleman. Do you mean because it was cable, or that the same rule applies to other property? Suppose we destroyed a house belonging to a Frenchman. Would we recompense him?

Mr. MAHON. When the United States troops destroy a house in this country we do not pay the people who own it. We do not pay for damage done on land.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. And we do not in Cuba.

Mr. MAHON. But the gentleman must remember that this occurred on the high seas, and the high seas beyond the 3-mile limit are neutral and belong to everybody.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is the point I wanted to get at. Is that the reason the gentleman's committee reported it?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; we would not have reported it if it had been for the destruction of any property on the land.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. You would not have reported in favor of any claim for property destroyed on land?

Mr. MAHON. The Spanish War Claims Commission have jurisdiction of that.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask whether there is any letter from Secretary Root or from President Roosevelt asking for the payment of this claim. I am trying to get at the basis of action, because it would seem to me that a French citizen making an investment in Cuba went there under the Spanish authority and took the protection of the Spanish law, and if the Spanish Government was unable to protect him in a war waged by the United States why should the United States pay the damage?

Mr. MAHON. Suppose we had captured a French ship and destroyed it, if it was necessary as an act of war?

Mr. PAYNE. This was not an act of war and it was not on the high seas.

Mr. MAHON. The cable ran under the high seas. This is a matter of comity between two friendly Governments, and you can pay it or let it alone, as you please.

Mr. HASKINS. This cable was destroyed by order of the officers of the Government of the United States. Here is a letter from Secretary Root urging the passage of the bill, and if the gentleman from New York desires it I will read it.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to have it read from the desk.

Mr. HASKINS. I will read it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send the letter to the desk and have it read by the Clerk?

Mr. HASKINS. I am a pretty good reader myself. This is the letter which was addressed to the Speaker of this House by Secretary Root on March 20:

> DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
> Washington, March 20, 1906.
> HON. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
> Speaker of the House of Representatives.
> SIR: I have the honor to invite your consideration of the matter of the relief of the French Telegraphic Cable Company, which is now pending in the House of Representatives.
> A bill (H. R. 9569) was introduced by Mr. MAHON on December 19, 1905, having for its object the payment to the French company of $77,712, being for expenses incurred in repairing its cables and property which were cut and damaged by forces of the United States in Cuba during the Spanish-American war. The Committee on War Claims, to whom the bill was referred, reported it favorably on January 9, 1906, whereupon it was committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed. (H. Rept. No. 151, present session.)
> A similar bill, introduced about the same time in the Senate (S. 2872), was favorably reported to that body and passed on February 5, 1906. On February 7, it was favorably reported from the Committee on War Claims and in like manner committed to the Committee of the Whole House and ordered to be printed. (H. Rept. No. 1061, present session.)
> It appears to be most desirable that one or the other of these two bills should be conclusively acted upon during the present session. The justice of the claim for which they provide relief is undisputed. The facts of the injuries to the cables and property of the French company having been done in the course of the military and naval operations of the United States against Spain are admitted. The amount stated in the bill was duly reached in the usual diplomatic course and is believed to represent justly the actual loss inflicted upon the French company. Payment of the ascertained sum was urged by the Executive upon the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congresses, and in both Congresses bills to the appropriate end were favorably reported from the Committee on War Claims, but conclusive action was not had thereon.
> The Government of the French Republic has at no time relaxed its interest in the enactment of the contemplated relief, and has repeatedly expressed its confidence that the United States would meet its admitted moral liability in the premises. International good faith requires that this be done. The French ambassador has repeatedly recalled the matter to the attention of this Department, and, in the light of the approbative action had in each of the Houses of the Congress thereon during the past five years, it is not easy to put forward satisfactory reasons for the omission to enact the measure. Another failure to fulfill what has become an established equitable duty toward a friendly government would be very embarrassing to both.
> I have therefore the honor to bring the subject earnestly to your attention in the hope that action may be taken by the House toward discharging this international obligation. I learn informally that the Committee on War Claims is disposed to acquiesce without amendment in the bill (S. 2872) as it has passed the Senate, thereby promptly disposing of the business without the complications which might follow independent action upon House bill 9569.
> The history of this claim and the facts upon which it rests are shown in Senate Document No. 84, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, a copy of which is appended for your greater convenience.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ELIHU ROOT.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I notice that Secretary Root does not anywhere give any reason why this is an international obligation. I presume it is because he assumes that the Members of this House know as much international law as he does and that we understand the obligation, but I confess I do not. I have not looked into the question, but can the gentleman tell us upon what principle of international law the property of this cable company stands upon any different footing from other property?

Mr. MAHON. Not a bit. There is no international law. It is simply international comity and good faith and equity.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. If this does not stand upon any different footing than anything else, I do not see why we should pay it.

Mr. MAHON. The committee has no interest in it. The House can pass it or not, as it sees fit.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have no interest in it either, and Secretary Root's opinion inclines me to favor it, but I should be glad if the committee would tell me why this is an international obligation any different from what it would be if we had battered down a French house in Cuba?

Mr. HASKINS. That has been answered.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. How has it been answered?

Mr. HASKINS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] stated that.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I understood him to say he did not make any distinction between a cable and a house.

Mr. OTJEN. If there were a citizen of France living in Cuba and we had taken some things belonging to him we certainly would pay for them, would we not?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, no; not if we had destroyed his house.

Mr. OTJEN. If it were taken by order of our officers?

Mr. MAHON. Or if we had taken a French citizen prisoner without any authority for doing it. This Government can not go running over the world like a brigand or a pirate.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. We were at war with Spain, and suppose we had knocked down a house there.

Mr. OTJEN. This was a risk of war.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I understand it was a risk of war, and I want to know whether in principle a cable is on any different footing from a house?

Mr. OTJEN. If we took from a French citizen a hundred bushels of oats for the use of the Army by order of an officer of the Army we would certainly pay for it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is on a different basis.

Mr. OTJEN. And it is proper that we should pay for this cable.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But we destroyed it; we did not take possession of it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. As I heard the letter read, the Secretary of State, who is a very able lawyer, carefully refrained from stating that it was any obligation under international law. The very strongest he made it was that it was an obligation in morals. He certainly would have stated that there was a legal obligation if there was any.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I simply wish to know the grounds on which it is claimed that payment should be made.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have read the bill and report with some degree of care. The only misgiving I have about the claim is the amount involved. There is nothing in the report to show how much damage was inflicted upon the cable. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], however, presents me a statement which he says shows the actual cost of repairing the cable. Of course there is no legal liability on the Federal Government for the destruction of this cable. It was an act of war; but property of this kind bears a different relation from property of a neutral which is incidentally destroyed on land which is the scene of warfare. The cable was upon what may be termed neutral territory; it was under the high seas, which is the common property of all civilized nations. This Government, in the exigencies of war, found it necessary, in order to prevent communication of information by the enemy, to destroy this neutral property. There is no legal liability on us; there is no law that fixes any international liability; it is purely an ethical question. I think it is the custom among nations to pay damages of this kind perpetrated under such circumstances. If the damage had been to a house or to individual property located on the island of Cuba, the theater of war, and as an incident of war, there would be no basis for a claim for damages, either legal or moral. Property in enemy territory which is destroyed by the operations of war is not the basis of a liability, though it is neutral property.

Here was a deliberate destruction of the cable line for the protection of our own Army, for the preventing of communication for our own purposes, and it was neutral property, occupying neutral territory, and I think, under the custom and usage of the nations, there is a moral or ethical liability on the part of the Government to make reparation. If the amount is right, I think there is no question but that it is the duty of this Government to pay the claim. The only misgiving I had was in relation to the amount, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] has supplied me with an itemized statement showing what he says is the actual cost of making the repair of the injury our Army inflicted on the cable property. A belligerent may destroy or convert to its own use enemy property in enemy territory or elsewhere without incurring any kind of pecuniary liability therefor. It may also destroy neutral property located in enemy territory as one of the incidents of war, but if it appropriates neutral property to its own use, either in enemy country or elsewhere, it incurs a liability, under the custom of nations, to make reparation. In destroying this French company's cable for the purpose of protecting our own interests, our Government became morally liable to pay the damages.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has answered the question which was in my mind. He says it is the custom and usage for nations to recognize a claim of this sort, and, if that is so, I am very willing in this case to recognize it. The only question that troubled me was why this cable should be different from other property, and I thought if it was not, we were setting a bad precedent.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that this bill be laid on the table, and that Senate bill 2872, farther down on the Calendar, be brought forward, and that the Senate bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

OWNERS OF THE BARGE CHARLIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 140.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 10482) for the relief of the owner or owners of the barge Charlie, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN M'CABE AND PATRICK M'CABE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 137.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 9098) for the relief of the legal representatives of John McCabe and Patrick McCabe, deceased, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

SARAH A. MILVANEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 141.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 3210) for the relief of Sarah H. Milvaney, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WEST TENNESSEE COLLEGE, JACKSON, TENN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5927) for the relief of the board of trustees of West Tennessee College, Jackson, Tenn.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the board of trustees of West Tennessee College, Jackson, Tenn., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000, as compensation for occupancy and damages to said college by the Union Army during the war; and for said purposes the above amount is hereby appropriated.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose all the House wants is an explanation of the bill, and I will give it briefly. This was a college building which was occupied two years during the civil war by the forces of Generals Logan and Grant as a hospital. There was a campus of 9 or 10 acres, a beautiful grove, and that grove was entirely destroyed, the timber being cut down and used as fuel. The building was used and occupied by the soldiers as a hospital for about two years. The damage to the building, as estimated by those familiar with it, was about $15,000. It was partially repaired, so that it could be used after the war by the college, and those repairs cost between $7,000 and $9,000, but it was not fully repaired. It is a college of the Baptist denomination. It educates ministers free of charge, and is doing a splendid work. The college is again on its feet and doing well, and they are making a great effort to improve and extend its usefulness.

They were very anxious to get what they could out of this as early as possible. I believe, if referred to the Court of Claims, they will be allowed as much as $10,000, but on account of the anxiety of the trustees of the institution to get this money as soon as possible, I asked for a direct appropriation and agreed to take $5,000, about one-third of the actual damage. Now, if there are any questions that any gentleman would like to ask about this bill, I will be very glad to answer them if I can. If not, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM A. HENDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution 142.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 10953) for the relief of the legal representatives of William A. Henderson, deceased, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

W. C. WALDROP, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF MILLINGTON WALDROP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution 143.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 10952) for the relief of W. C. Waldrop, administrator of the estate of Millington Waldrop, deceased, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

J. B. ORBISON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7679) for the relief of J. B. Orbison.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300 to J. B. Orbison, in full satisfaction of his claim for commutation paid by him in 1863 when drafted into the military service of the United States, he not then being a citizen of the United States.

With the following amendment:

In line 6, after the word "Orbison," insert "of Butler County, Pa."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, this is rather an odd sort of bill, and I think the committee ought to know its character. I have read the bill and report quite carefully, and it seems to provide for the reimbursement of Orbison for money he was compelled to pay in procuring a substitute to serve for him during the civil war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Commutation money.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Commutation money.

Mr. DALZELL. He was a colored man who was drafted into the service, and not being a citizen, of course he was not liable to draft. He was compelled either to serve or to pay his $300. He raised the $300, paid it, and the Government has had possession of it all this time—wrongfully, of course—and he ought to be reimbursed, it seems to me.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the ground on which he bases his claim is that being a colored man, under the Constitution and laws of the country at that time he was not a citizen of the United States, and was not subject to military duty, and that notwithstanding this exemption he was drafted to serve in the Union Army, and in order to avoid the service paid the commutation money of $300 levied by law. My idea of the bill from a legal standpoint, if the Government is liable in any case for compulsory military duty or commutation it would be liable here. Under the law and the decisions of the courts at that time a colored man was not a citizen of the United States. He was not entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizenship, and of course it would be very inequitable and altogether wrong to compel him to fight in defense of a country of which he was not, and could not become, a citizen, and in which he was denied the ordinary rights and privileges of citizenship.

Mr. CANDLER. How was it possible for him to be drafted under those circumstances?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He was in Pennsylvania. He was a resident of that State, and he was on the roll and was drafted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, it was not an uncommon thing for aliens—natives of other countries—to be drafted. They were always discharged when they could make proper proof.

Mr. CANDLER. He did not perform any service at all?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He did not, but he paid the commutation money of $300 under coercion. He had to make that payment or go into the Army, and he made the payment in order to escape military service, so it was a payment under compulsion. I think, under clear equitable principles, he is entitled to recovery. I make this statement simply to show the rather anomalous character of the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add, in addition to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has said, that we are not establishing any precedent by this action. We have already paid claims of this character.

Mr. MAHON. Very few of them.

Mr. DALZELL. That is true, but very few of them exist. The last case we paid we paid $300 plus the interest. In this case, however, the claimant is to be allowed only his $300, which is rather rough on him, I think. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY E. RHOADES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9297) for the relief of Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, retired.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9297) for the relief of Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, retired.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, this bill pertains to naval affairs and was introduced by Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. He is not here, and I move that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be so passed.

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF THE COMPAÑÍA DE LOS FERROCARRILES DE PUERTO RICO.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Compañía de los Ferrocarriles de Puerto Rico, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $13,094.45, being for compensation for mail service performed in Porto Rico during the period of military occupation in the years 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, and 1902, and prior to the regular authorization of railroad mail service upon its lines.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on War Claims had this bill under consideration and declined to make a direct appropriation because we did not have the data. Now, this claim comes the same way as others and the committee report this bill with a substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Court of Claims be, and it is hereby, given jurisdiction over the claims of the Compañía de los Ferrocarriles de Puerto Rico with power to find the facts and to enter judgment against the United States for the reasonable value of the services performed by said company in the Island of Porto Rico for transporting the mails between the 12th day of August, 1898, and the 5th day of December, 1899; also for transporting the municipal police, or guardia civille, between the 12th day of August, 1898, and the 31st day of August, 1902; and for the difference between the amount allowed for transporting the troops, munitions of war, supplies, and the like and the reasonable value of said services for the same period, together with the expense of repair and maintenance of telegraph lines of the Signal Corps, all of said services having been performed during the military occupation of said Island."

That is a claim that ought to go to the courts.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. You are reading a substitute sending the matter to the Court of Claims?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; the whole business.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is what you propose to offer?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I read the report of this bill very carefully, and it seems that from the report on file in support of it that the amount has been pretty carefully ascertained.

Mr. MAHON. Well, I have no objection to passing the bill. I intended to offer a substitute out of due precaution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The report is quite an exhaustive one and shows in detail the character of the services.

Mr. MAHON. Well, then, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Just a word or two. This railroad company operated a line of railroad in the island of Porto Rico under a Spanish charter, by the terms of which the Spanish Government guaranteed it an 8 per cent dividend upon the amount of capital invested in the road, and as one of the conditions of the guaranty the road undertook to transport all Spanish mails free of charge. In October, 1898, when the Federal Government took possession of the island by military force, the railroad continued to carry the United States mail, military mail, and do and perform those things that it had undertaken to do in its Spanish charter, free of charge for the military governor of the island, and it continued to do that work for some two years. The attorneys of the road, after the island was finally ceded to the United States, insisted that the United States Government took the place of Spain in the guaranty and subvention arrangement, and there was some controversy between the railroad company and the United States Government over that question. It was finally settled by the grant and an acceptance of a new charter by the terms of which the railroad company surrendered all claim upon the Federal Government for payment under the subvention clause of the royal charter from Spain. But the right was expressly reserved in that agreement to present to the Federal Government its claims for services performed during the military occupation of the island by the United States in carrying mails, and a claim was presented amounting to $20,000, which was referred to the postal authorities. Inspectors and special agents were sent down to Porto Rico by the Postmaster-General, and they made a careful and thorough investigation of the question and found that there was $13,694.45 fairly and justly due the railroad company for transportation of mails and other services performed for the United States up to the time of the acceptance of the new charter from the provincial government—that is, from the executive council government of Porto Rico. Now, I fear, Mr. Chairman, if this claim should be referred to the Court of Claims there is liability of the court allowing a much larger sum than is found to be due by the commission, and I believe it will be better policy to pay the claim than to send it to the Court of Claims. There is no question about the liability of the Federal Government for the service. The evidence is conclusive upon that question, and the sole question is one of amount, and the United States adjusting officer seems to have scrutinized the claim with a great deal of care and eliminated everything of questionable character from it, and the amount he reports, it seems to me, is justly and equitably due, and it would be safer and easier for the Government to pay it than to refer it to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MAHON. Then I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

BENJAMIN F. KING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11108) for the relief of Benjamin F. King.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11108) for the relief of Benjamin F. King.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Benjamin F. King, late a private in Company A, One hundred and fifty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and allowances of an enlisted man of infantry from January 28, 1865, to June 19, 1865, including transportation to his home, deducting therefrom any money paid him during that period.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. MAHON. I would suggest to the gentleman that he let this go on. This is a very small amount, only involving $75, due to this man; and when twelve or thirteen men have examined it and stated that it was correct, I think he ought to be willing to allow it to go.

Mr. MILLER. If this bill is all right, it ought to have an explanation, and if it is all right the action will be all right. I think the bill is not all right, and this bill ought not to pass this committee.

Mr. MAHON. Well, Mr. Chairman, when a committee comprised of thirteen good lawyers, not counting myself, have passed on a small matter of this kind and made a unanimous report, I do not think an explanation ought to be demanded. This was a little mistake made on the pay roll. This man ought to get his money; he is entitled to $75; and because it is a small matter, I do not pretend to argue the matter to the House, and they can pass it or not, as they choose.

The bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

M. A. M'CAFFERTY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1863) for the relief of M. A. McCafferty.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1863) for the relief of M. A. McCafferty.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay to M. A. McCafferty, of O'Neill, Nebr., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $65, for furnishing a casket and a hearse and defraying all other expenses incident to the burial of the remains of John De Boer, a private soldier in Troop G, First United States Cavalry, stationed at Fort Meade, S. Dak., such burial having been made at the request of the commanding military officer at said Fort Meade.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask what this is.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, this is the payment for the burial expenses of a soldier. Ordinarily the military authorities bury them. The coffin was purchased, and this is the exact amount that the Government would have had to pay if it had purchased it itself. The military authorities made the request that the party should bury him. The Government pays the expense; and when it pays this it pays what it does in all cases.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that a general law or a custom?

Mr. MAHON. It is usually paid for by the Treasury Department. They had no money in the Treasury Department for it, or the Treasury would have paid it.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

TRUSTEES OF WEIR'S CHAPEL, MISS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8952) for the relief of the trustees of Weir's Chapel, Tippah County, Miss.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8952) for the relief of the trustees of Weir's Chapel, Tippah County, Miss.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400 to James B. Jefferies, Robert Mitchell, and W. F. Duncan, trustees of Weir's Chapel, a Methodist Church in Tippah County, Miss., or to their successors in office, in full satisfaction of any and all demands against the Government of the United States, for the use of said church building for military purposes by the Federal Army during the civil war.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the nature of that bill?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi to explain it.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to pay for the use of a little country Methodist church in my own county. I know all the facts. I know the witnesses who testified on the matter. The church was torn down by General Schofield's orders while passing from Memphis down into Mississippi. All the heavy timbers were used to corduroy a narrow bit of little creek bottom and the lighter material was used for building shelter for his troops. The church was almost new when it was torn down. I know in person every man and all of the people who are connected with this thing, and know them to be fully reliable, and the committee has based its action on these facts.

Mr. PAYNE. Are these gentlemen named the present trustees of the church?

Mr. SPIGHT. Yes, sir; they are named in the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. It did not give the trustees as in 1860.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

AGNES W. HILLS AND SARAH J. HILLS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5217) for the relief of Agnes W. Hills and Sarah J. Hills.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Agnes W. Hills and Sarah J. Hills the sum of $7,561.80, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the value of personal property belonging to Albert G. Hills and Alfred C. Hills, both deceased, taken and converted to the use of the United States by the military forces of the United States.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 10, after the word "States," insert "during the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

Mr. MACON. I will ask the gentleman to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. MAHON. I will first yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL] to explain the bill.

Mr. MACON. Will you yield me five minutes after the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to explain the bill.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, in February, 1863, Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, was commander of the Department of the Gulf. He commanded the forces that were then in New Orleans, that city itself being under martial law. Therefore it devolved upon him not only to attend to whatever might arise there as to military duties, but also to administer the affairs of that city. The military forces had taken possession of a printing plant known as the "New Era," and it was necessary that there should be a newspaper published in the city for the proper administration of its municipal affairs, as well as the publication of military orders. It was found almost impossible, or at least very difficult, to carry on a newspaper in that way. So in February, 1863, General Banks made a contract with the two Hills—Alfred C. Hills and Alfred G. Hills—who were then lieutenants in a Louisiana regiment. These two men were experienced newspaper men; one of them was the correspondent of the New York Evening Post and the other of the Boston Journal; and in order that the two men might carry out the terms of the contract that General Banks made with them they resigned their commissions in the Army. The contract was this: That they were to have the use of the printing plant just as it was. The Government was to assume no obligation whatever. The Hills were to pay all the expense, and if they were able to make any profits by carrying on that business, they were to receive those profits. Under that contract the work was carried on for thirteen months by the Hills, when a disagreement arose between them, and the plant was taken away.

After the plant was taken away a commission was appointed by General Banks, consisting of the mayor of the city and two other officials who were to make a careful examination of all the assets of the printing establishment, and ascertain what belonged to the Government and what had been placed in the establishment by the two Hills. That commission made that examination. They made a detailed report to General Banks. They found that the two Hills had in that printing establishment:

Material and type in the newspaper office	$2,500.00
Type and material in the job printing office	1,900.00
News printing paper on hand	2,900.00
Sundries	261.80
Total	7,561.80

Which is the amount carried in this bill. It was the property that the two Hills, under their contract with General Banks, acting for the military forces there, had put into the plant and paid out of their own pockets. This commission made this report; but instead of the report being sent to Washington and going through the auditing department as it ought to have done (all who knew General Banks knew that he was rather unsystematic in business matters), in some way that report got pigeonholed, and these Hills or their representatives have never received one cent of this money which this commission, appointed in behalf of the United States, said was due to them on account of the property they had in that plant, taken and used by the Government. This bill is for the purpose of paying what this commission reported was due to them, and in the absence of payment it is simply a case of confiscation by the United States Government of that amount of property.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Was this business, carried on by the Messrs. Hill, a profitable business for thirteen months?

Mr. TIRRELL. There is no evidence to show whether it was prosperous or not, except this, that they had that amount of merchandise in the printing plant, which they had paid for.

Mr. PAYNE. Out of the profits of the business?

Mr. TIRRELL. Out of the profits of the business, or out of their own pockets.

Mr. PAYNE. I see by the report that the reason why this property was taken over by the successors of the Hills, who were a couple of employees of theirs, was that the Hills got to quarreling between themselves, or could not agree. At least there was a matter of difference between them.

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And they threw up the job and turned the property over to their employees. Now, why should not the gentlemen to whom they turned over the property pay them for this?

Mr. TIRRELL. Wait a minute and I will go on and explain still further, in order that the gentleman may understand that particular point. The governmental plant was turned over to two employees of the Hills to carry on that business. When that property was turned over, there having been no settlement with the Hills, the property which the Hills had bought and paid for, and which was their property, although it remained in the Government plant, was turned over to these two foremen, and they carried on the business under the same contract as that made by General Banks with the two Hills. After a period of time these men who succeeded the two Hills, having used the Hills' property as well as put property of their own into that plant, retired, and under a new arrangement the Supervising Architect of the Treasury here in Washington took charge of the matter. These successors of the two Hills put in a claim to the Supervising Architect for the amount of property that they themselves had put into the plant, which they had paid for out of their own funds—a claim similar to the one now under consideration.

The Supervising Architect not approving the bill, or neglecting to pay it, they brought suit in the United States circuit court at New Orleans, where all these facts were passed upon and adjudicated, and that court decided that that was their property, that they were entitled to payment, and they were paid. In other words, there has been an adjudication by the circuit court of the United States on a similar state of facts, and that court has decided that the property belonging to the gentlemen who were carrying on the business under a similar contract should be paid for.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did that judgment also include the $7,000 worth of property belonging to the Messrs. Hill?

Mr. TIRRELL. They did not claim any part of that, only the part that they had put in. It was precisely a similar claim to the one that the Hills put in.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That was for property other than the property covered by this claim here?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then what became of the $700,000?

Mr. TIRRELL. The Government of the United States took it and had the benefit of it and paid nothing for it.

Mr. MURDOCK. It had actual physical possession?

Mr. TIRRELL. It had. The Government took it and had the benefit of it, and it has never been paid for. Now, I should like to call your attention to what General Banks himself says about this claim. He says:

> The property added to the printing material belonging to the Government was purchased by them out of their own funds, and it belonged exclusively to them; they were not expected to account for and pay it over to the Government, nor was the Government under any obligation to make good any claims that might exist against them. They were to have all the profits and take all the chances of loss and gain, and be responsible for all losses. They were not agents of the Government, but acting as owners, and as such, with all the rights of the latter. They were under no obligations to the Government, except to return in good condition the property which was intrusted to them.

I would say, gentlemen of the House, that this claim has been for years before either the Senate or the House, has been favorably reported upon, and the only reason final action never has been reached is that which is applicable to hundreds of other claims, that it has never had an opportunity to come before the House for consideration.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN A. MERONEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3997) for the relief of John A. Meroney.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay John A. Meroney, of Giles County, Tenn., late a member of Company D, Twelfth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $125, being for a horse taken by or furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion.

With the following amendment recommended by the committee:

In line 8 strike out "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof "fifty."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will explain this bill briefly. This bill is to pay a man, who was a soldier in the Federal Army, the value of one horse taken from him while he was in the service—taken from his home. The report is short, and I will read it. It is as follows:

> This is a claim for the value of one horse alleged to have been furnished to the military forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion.
> Claimant was an enlisted man in the service of the United States at the time when it is alleged his horse was taken. Claimant filed his claim in the War Department, office of the Quartermaster-General, and it was investigated by an agent of that Department, and on February 14, 1884, he reported:
> "Claimant and his wife are of good character and reliable. I am fully convinced that claimant's horse was taken as alleged; that no receipt or voucher was given, and the claimant is entitled to an allowance. I therefore respectfully recommend an allowance in favor of claimant for one horse at the price paid for horses suitable for cavalry service by the Government at Nashville, Tenn., in 1864, as follows, $150."
> No payment has ever been made for this horse.

Mr. Chairman, I will say that in drawing the bill I made a mistake, and put in $125 when it should have been $150.

Mr. PAYNE. I am glad the gentleman explained that, for I was afraid the soldier did not know how much his horse was worth, and the gentleman has relieved my mind. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. That is a fact; it was a mistake of mine.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EXAMINATION OF CERTAIN CLAIMS OF THE STATE OF MISSOURI.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 567) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 567) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of certain claims of the State of Missouri.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, what is the number of that?

The CHAIRMAN. Senate bill 567.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I would like for the gentleman from Missouri to consent that the bill should be laid aside until the next day.

Mr. FULKERSON. I would like to go on with it now.

Mr. MAHON. It is a bill involving important matters, and we could not finish it to-day if we took it up, and I have assured parties when we did take it up we would give them full time—a couple of hours or so—when you could discuss it and I could discuss it, and I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. FULKERSON. I will ask the chairman of the committee if I am to be assured that this bill will be presented at this session of Congress?

Mr. MAHON. Well, the bill will be the first on the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside without prejudice.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside without prejudice.

JAMES A. PAULK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14206) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James A. Paulk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,390 to James A. Paulk, of Bullock County, Ala., being the amount found due him by the Court of Claims on January 29, 1906.

EPHRAIM GREENAWALT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1142) for the relief of Ephraim Greenawalt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Ephraim Greenawalt, of Lancaster County, Pa., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300, being for commutation money alleged to have been unlawfully collected from him by the military authorities of the United States April 5, 1864.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

C. R. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14341) for the relief of C. R. Williams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to C. R. Williams, of Rutherford County, Tenn., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200, for one mare taken and used by the military forces of the United States during the late civil war.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CARL F. KOLBE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6837) for the relief of Carl F. Kolbe.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $164.95, to Carl F. Kolbe, of Akron, Ohio, a reimbursement of money to the said Kolbe of the above-named sum which was paid out in cash by him in 1861, while acting under orders and by directions of the colonel of the First West Virginia Cavalry, the said sum of money being paid out by the said Kolbe for transportation and subsistence of the First West Virginia Cavalry Band, which band was recruited and transported by the said Kolbe at his own expense, in compliance with the orders received from the colonel of the said regiment; and that the money appropriated for this use shall be immediately available.

Mr. PAYNE. I am a little thirsty to know what the circumstances were about this claim for money paid forty-seven years ago.

Mr. MAHON. The bill explains itself.

Mr. PAYNE. There was an overflowing Treasury most of the time.

Mr. MAHON. An officer of the United States Army ordered this man to do this, he paid the railroad fares of the men and the Government has never paid him. They give no reason why they have kept this money for forty-five years without interest.

Mr. PAYNE. It ought to be pretty well authenticated.

Mr. MAHON. It is well authenticated.

Mr. PAYNE. Was it recommended by an officer? There is ample provision of law, and the Department is always open to hear such things.

Mr. SOUTHARD. The only affidavit in the case is his own affidavit and the affidavit of the colonel of the regiment who directed him to assemble this band. He organized them out in Ohio and brought them to West Virginia.

Mr. PAYNE. What became of the band?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Well, the band remained in the service a while and was discharged.

Mr. PAYNE. Were they mustered in?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Oh, yes. I will say there is the evidence of the man himself and the colonel of the regiment. The claim or statement of it was made out promptly at the time, but was not presented until some time afterwards. The colonel of the regiment also makes an affidavit that is printed in the report. That is the evidence. The claim seems to be well authenticated.

Mr. PAYNE. Why was it not paid before?

Mr. SOUTHARD. For the same reason that a great many other claims have not been paid before. When it was presented there was no money to pay it and the statute of limitations run against it. There seems to be no question about the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. When was it first presented?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Oh, I do not remember; but years after the war. The statement is made that the reason why it was not presented is this: The bill was made out promptly, just after the band was mustered in, but the bill was lost for a time and was not presented to the Government for a number of years. When it was presented to the Government it was not paid, and my recollection is that the reason given was that the statute of limitations had run against it. There was some question as to whether all of the bill was a proper charge against the Government, but I think it has been determined that it is a proper charge. It is a small bill of two or three hundred dollars.

Mr. PAYNE. Why did not the Government in the time of it pay that which was a proper charge?

Mr. SOUTHARD. You might ask the same question with reference to many other bills that appear on this Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. That does not answer the question. Concerning a great many of these bills, people do not know that they have any claim, do not know the law, and I am sorry to say that sometimes they do not know the facts, until a claim agent hunts them up and tells them what they are in order to present the claim.

Mr. SOUTHARD. There seems to be no question about this. The band was recruited and was maintained for a time, there is no question about that. This man Kolbe paid the expenses of the band, paid for its subsistence, paid its traveling expenses to Wheeling, W. Va., where the band was mustered in, and the bill is correct.

Mr. PAYNE. The amount does not seem to be very large.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if it was shown that the band was actually mustered in?

Mr. SOUTHARD. There is no question made by the Department but that the band was mustered in, and the colonel of the regiment makes affidavit or statement to that effect, which is printed in the report.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

RHODE ISLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5330) for the relief of the State of Rhode Island.

The bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on War Claims was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to resettle and readjust the claim of the State of Rhode Island for and on account of its expenditures in raising volunteers during the war with Spain. And in said resettlement and readjustment the same rules shall be applied as have been applied by the Auditor and Comptroller in the settlement of the like claims of other States. And allowances shall also be made in such resettlement and readjustment of the same class or character of items disallowed that were disallowed in the settlement of the like claim of the State of Iowa, for which appropriation was made under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1901."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the gentleman from Rhode Island make an explanation of his bill.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Chairman, in the adjustment of the claims of the State of Rhode Island growing out of the Spanish war there were disallowed a number of claims. Unfortunately, in that State the elections of State officers occur annually, and so the attorney having this claim in charge went out and another one came in, and the disallowed items were not understood to be valid. Later, the claim of the State of Iowa for precisely the same kind of items was allowed, and this bill is now introduced for the purpose of sending the claim of the State of Rhode Island to the Court of Claims under precisely the same circumstances as those which appeared in the Iowa case. This case is precisely on all fours with that of the State of Iowa.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand the gentleman, it is only very recently that the authorities in Rhode Island have come to a proper understanding as to this item of claim, and that only after being educated by the people of Iowa. I want to say that the explanation is entirely satisfactory to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAPRON. The gentleman from New York is entirely wrong, but if he is satisfied I am. [Laughter.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ESTATE OF CHARLES E. RUSSELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16015) for the relief of the estate of Capt. Charles Russell.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Capt. Charles E. Russell, deceased, the sum of $721.86, being the amount due to the said Russell on salary while serving as quartermaster, Eighth United States Infantry, who died in the service May 26, 1902, before he had time to prepare a proper settlement with the United States Government, which settlement was being prepared by said officer at the time of his death.

The following amendment recommended by the committee was read:

In line 8 strike out the words "on salary" and insert "for money disbursed."

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, what the facts are in this case.

Mr. MAHON. The facts are stated in the report.

The object of the bill is to reimburse the estate of Charles E. Russell for money disbursed while serving as quartermaster in the Philippines. This officer died, and on an investigation of his papers it shows that he had paid out quartermaster's property, $24.61; emergency fund, $332.73; regular supplies, $217.18; Army transportation, $147.34—amounting in all to $694.14. Various papers and books containing memoranda made by the officer indicate that he had in course of preparation vouchers of disbursements made by him, among them surrendered arms paid for by him, amounting to $850 in Mexican currency, or, approximately, $425 in United States currency; 77 cords of wood, and 1,752 pounds of zacate, and this will more than balance the amount charged against him.

The whole case is that this officer died while making up the report and practically had paid out all of this money for legitimate purposes under the law. After careful examination of the papers left in his tent and chest it was found that he had paid out more money than he had credit for. It is not an old case, but it is one that ought to be paid. If the officer had lived he would have got the credit at the Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

BENJAMIN LILLARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 670) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Benjamin Lillard, deceased.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of the estate of Benjamin Lillard, deceased, late of Rutherford County, State of Tennessee, $16,865, the finding of the Court of Claims certified to Congress on December 19, 1904.

The following amendment was recommended by the committee:

In line 4, after the word "pay," insert the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. PAYNE. This is a considerable amount, and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the committee, will give us a full explanation.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, it appears from the evidence that Benjamin Lillard, deceased, the person from whom the property is alleged to have been taken, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

There was taken from the claimant's decedent, in the county of Rutherford, State of Tennessee, during the war, by the military forces of the United States for the use of the Army, property reasonably worth the sum of $16,865. No payment has ever been made for the same.

This was for stores, grain, horses, wood, and hay, and there is no cotton in the case at all; they would not hear anything about cotton. Those are the facts as found by the court. I think the claim originally mounted way up into $30,000 or $40,000, but the court cut it down to $16,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH M. WITT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 278.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 4401) for the relief of the estate of Joseph M. Witt, deceased, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

J. B. FULLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 279.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 8001) for the relief of the heirs of J. B. Fuller, deceased, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HARDIN P. FRANKLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 339.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 4577) for the relief of Sabini Jones, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN C. M'GEHEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was House resolution No. 340.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 8038) for the relief of the heirs of John C. McGehee, deceased, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The resolution was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WIDOWS AND SONS OF CHARLES W. DAKIN AND THOMAS J. HENNESSY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5969) to reward the widow and minor son of Capt. Charles W. Dakin and the widow and minor children of Thomas J. Hennessy, late of the San Francisco fire department, who lost their lives while fighting a fire on board of the United States Army transport Meade.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, that is not a war claim, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania please state his point of order?

Mr. MAHON. The point of order is that that does not come through the Committee on War Claims. It is not a war claim and can not be considered to-day under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. This day is not exclusively for war claims.

Mr. MAHON. It is, outside of the Committee on Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill that has just been reported comes from the Committee on Military Affairs. It is not a claim. The Committee on War Claims has precedence over the Committee on Claims on this day, but not over other committees who have bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, then I now move that the committee rise and report the several bills and resolutions to the House with a recommendation that the amendments thereto be agreed to, and that the bills as amended and the resolutions do pass.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put I desire to ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to, but we have to get these bills through the House to-night, and I would like to do it, but I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar and had directed him to report sundry private bills, some with amendments and some without, and sundry resolutions with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended and the resolutions do pass; and also that the bill H. R. 9569 do lie on the table.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on all the bills and resolutions and amendments thereto to their final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to order the previous question on all bills and resolutions and amendments thereto to their final passage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I think probably it might be proper to ask unanimous consent to let these resolutions go through en bloc in order to save time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that sundry resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole shall be considered as agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS PASSED.

The House then proceeded to a consideration of the resolutions and bills just reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

FEDERAL QUARANTINE.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on the 9th of March, reported an amendment to the bill H. R. 14316, introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] "to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and to impose further duties thereon."

At the meeting to-day the committee adopted a substitute for this amendment. I understand that a rule has been reported for the consideration of the bill on Tuesday next; and I ask unanimous consent that the substitute adopted by the committee may be printed in the RECORD, so that Members may have full information as to the action of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The substitute is as follows:

Substitute adopted March 31, 1906, by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the amendment reported by said committee March 9, 1906, to the bill (H. R. 14316) to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and to impose further duties thereon.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the control, direction, and management of all quarantine stations, grounds, and anchorages established by authority of the United States, and as soon as practicable after the approval of this act shall select and designate such suitable places for them and establish the same at such points on or near the seacoast of the United States as in his judgment are best suited for the same and necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into the United States, and in his discretion he may also establish at the group of islands known as the "Dry Tortugas," at the western end of the Florida reef, and at such other point or points on or near the seacoast of the United States (not to exceed four in the aggregate), as he deems necessary, quarantine grounds, stations, and anchorages, whereat or whereto infected vessels having on board any person with yellow fever and bound for any port in the United States may be detained or sent for the purpose of being disinfected, having their cargoes disinfected and discharged, if necessary, and their sick treated in hospitals until all danger of infection or contagion from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, or crews, has been removed.

SEC. 2. That in cases in which the title to the land and water so selected and designated is in the United States it shall be the duty of the department, bureau, or official of the United States having custody or possession of such land and water, or any part thereof, not used by the Government for other purposes designated by law, of possession of said Dry Tortugas islands, on demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, to deliver the same into his custody and possession for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, evidenced such delivery by a suitable instrument in writing to be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury. That in cases in which the title to such land and water, or any part thereof, is in any other owner than the United States it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to secure the title and possession of the same to the United States for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, by purchase at a reasonable price, if possible; but if, in his judgment, the price demanded for such property be excessive, he is hereby authorized to apply to the Attorney-General of the United States to cause to be instituted, in the proper tribunal, condemnation proceedings in the name of the United States for the purpose of acquiring for the United States the title and possession of such land and water, and said Attorney-General shall, as soon as possible after such application by the Secretary of the Treasury, cause such proceedings to be instituted and conducted to a conclusion, and the custody and possession of such land and water, when duly acquired in accordance with the award made in such condemnation proceedings, shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

SEC. 3. That on acquiring possession of any land and water in accordance with the provisions of this act for the purpose of establishing thereat a quarantine station and anchorage, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be published in such newspapers as he may think proper, once a week for four successive weeks, a notice of the selection and designation of such places for quarantine stations and anchorages, with a description of the boundaries of such quarantine stations and anchorages, and such rules and regulations as he shall adopt and promulgate, requiring vessels with yellow fever among their passengers or crews to go to specified quarantine stations and anchorages, to be dealt with there before visiting any port of the United States. He shall establish at such quarantine stations and anchorages all necessary instrumentalities for disinfecting vessels and their cargoes, and where the same shall be required, shall erect the necessary hospital buildings, and install the necessary furniture and fittings for receiving and treating the sick among the passengers and crews of vessels going to such quarantine stations and anchorages, and provide for the separation of those among their passengers and crews who are suffering from yellow fever from those who are in good health, and shall further provide for doing all things necessary to eradicate such disease from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, and crews.

SEC. 4. That any vessel, or any officer of any vessel, or other person other than State health or quarantine officers, entering within the limits of any quarantine grounds and anchorages, or any quarantine station and anchorage, or departing therefrom, in disregard of the quarantine rules and regulations or without the permission of the officer in charge of such quarantine ground and anchorage, or of such quarantine station and anchorage, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. That any master or owner of any vessel violating any provision of this act, or any provision of an act entitled "An act granting additional powers and imposing additional duties on the Marine-Hospital Service," approved February 15, 1893, or violating any rule or regulation made in accordance with this act or said act of February 15, 1893, relating to the inspection of vessels, or to the prevention of the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, or any master, owner, or agent of any vessel making a false statement relative to the sanitary condition of such vessel or its contents, or as to the health of any passenger or person thereon, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. That in any place where a quarantine station and plant is already established by State or local authorities it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, before selecting and designating a quarantine station and grounds and anchorage for vessels, to examine such established stations and plants, with a view of obtaining a transfer of the site and plants to the United States, and whenever the proper authorities shall be ready to transfer the same or surrender the use thereof to the United States the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to obtain title thereto or possession and use thereof, and to pay a reasonable compensation therefor, if, in his opinion, such purchase or use will be necessary to the United States for quarantine purposes.

SEC. 6. That whenever any established station, or any land or water, or any part thereof, shall be acquired by the United States under the provisions of this act, jurisdiction over the same shall be ceded to the United States by any State in which the same is situated before any compensation therefor shall be paid or any permanent structures or improvements be made or maintained thereon.

SEC. 7. That every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful, all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to detain or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

SEC. 8. That the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, as well as for the purpose generally of preventing the importation of yellow fever into the United States, and for the further purposes, in cooperation with State or municipal health authorities, of eradicating it should it be imported, of preventing its spread from one State into another State, and of destroying its cause.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to further protect the public health and make more effective the national quarantine."

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the legislature of the State of New York, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT. I present a concurrent resolution of the legislature of New York, relative to the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy. I ask that the concurrent resolution be read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
In Senate, Albany, March 1, 1906.

Whereas it appears from the investigation recently made by the Senate of the United States, and otherwise, that polygamy still exists in certain places in the United States notwithstanding prohibitory statutes enacted by the several States thereof, and

Whereas the practice of polygamy is generally condemned by the people of the United States and there is a demand for the more effectual prohibition thereof by placing the subject under Federal jurisdiction and control, at the same time reserving to each State the right to make and enforce its own laws relating to marriage and divorce; now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That application be and hereby is made to Congress, under the provisions of article 5 of the Constitution of the United States for the calling of a convention to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States whereby polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall be prohibited and Congress shall be given power to force such prohibition by appropriate legislation.

Resolved, That the legislatures of all other States of the United States, now in session or when next convened, be and they are hereby respectfully requested to join in this application by the adoption of this or an equivalent resolution.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be and he hereby is directed to transmit copies of this application to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and to the several Members of said body representing this State therein; also to transmit copies hereof to the legislatures of all other States of the United States.

By order of the senate:

LAFAYETTE B. GLEASON, Clerk.

IN ASSEMBLY, March 2, 1906.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order of the assembly:

A. E. BAXTER, Clerk.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Office of the Secretary of State, ss:

The foregoing is a true copy of a concurrent resolution of the senate and assembly of the State of New York, filed in this office March 6, 1906.

Given under my hand and the seal of office of the secretary of state, at the city of Albany, this 20th day of March, in the year 1906.

DISCRIMINATION IN RAILWAY RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from a firm of Richmond bankers, accompanied by a memorandum, in regard to railroad rate discrimination. I do this in pursuance of the policy suggested by a Senator that we need light along this line. I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the communication.

The paper was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS,
Richmond, Va., March 29, 1906.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith memorandum showing gross discrimination by Pennsylvania Railroad against Richmond and eastern Virginia points in favor of Baltimore and Philadelphia. This is done as the result of the dominating influence and practically controlling influence which the Pennsylvania exercises over the Norfolk and Western and the Chesapeake and Ohio, which dominating influence is really a controlling influence.

It is a matter of common knowledge that President Stevens, of the Chesapeake and Ohio, and President Johnson, of the Norfolk and Western, receive their instructions from the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, or from the directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad, who are also directors in the Norfolk and Western and the Chesapeake and Ohio.

The information I inclose to you is of special interest to Senator SCOTT and Senator ELKINS, of West Virginia.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. WILLIAMS.

[Extract from the News Leader, January 8, 1906.]

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST RICHMOND.

Various Richmond manufacturers must have been amused by Maj. James H. Dooley's letter protesting against regulation of railroad freight rates by Government commission, printed here last week. Major Dooley argued that the commission, if created, will be composed chiefly of northern and western men, and that they will discriminate against the South and deprive southern cities of advantages in freight rates which they now enjoy.

Virginia people, and especially Richmond people, will judge of this matter by what they see and know under their own eyes. The Chesapeake and Ohio road charges the Richmond manufacturer $1.60 per ton of 2,000 pounds from New River and $1.70 from Kanawha. Philadelphia and Baltimore have a rate of $1.38 per ton, a difference in their favor of 22 cents on every ton of coal hauled. If a Richmond manufacturer uses 20,000 tons of coal a year this makes an absolute difference against him of $8,000 in hard cash, which is equivalent to 4 per cent on $200,000 invested. The same road gives rates to Backbone and Covington of 65 cents from New River and 75 cents from Kanawha, and to Low Moor, Longdale, and Iron Gate rates of $1 and $1.10. At these points the Chesapeake and Ohio discriminates in favor of the large consumer, what may be called the wholesale purchaser, to the extent of 30 or 40 cents per ton against the comparatively small purchaser for domestic use. In Richmond the largest consumers, the manufacturers, are given no advantage over the small consumers. What favoritism is shown is given to the other railroads. Our information is that the Chesapeake and Ohio gives all the other railroads, including even the Farmville and Powhatan, a rate of $1.25 from New River and $1.35 from Kanawha, while exacting $1.60 and $1.70 from our manufacturers.

So far from gaining an advantage from the improved facilities and equipments of the railroads Richmond actually has been made to suffer from them. In 1899 we paid here $1.65 per ton of 2,240 pounds from the Kanawha district. Now we pay $1.70 per ton of 2,000 pounds, which is equivalent to $1.90 per ton of 2,240 pounds, a net advance since 1899 of 13¼ per cent.

The discrimination against Richmond is not only a wrong done this city, but it is distinctly illegal. It is continued in the very teeth of the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of the City Gas Company, of Norfolk, against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, decided last October. This is a case, which, as we understand law, would come directly under the supervision and regulation of a Government commission. Enforcement of proper rates would be worth scores of thousands of dollars to the city of Richmond in the direct saving of money paid out for freight and coal, and many scores of thousands more by enabling her to meet the competition of other cities on equal terms and to offer inducements to new manufacturing establishments to come here.

In the face of a showing like this, it is hard to understand how Major Dooley can argue that the railroad companies are treating the South so well that interference with them and regulation of their rates would be likely to injure this section.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. PETTUS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5215) to fix the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that it be presently considered. It is a very short bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary were, in section 2, page 1, line 13, after the word "the," to strike out "justice" and insert "judge;" and on page 2, line 2, after the word "presiding," to strike out "justice" and insert "judge;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That whenever the judge for the northern district of Alabama deems it advisable, on account of disability or absence, or of the accumulation of business therein, or for any other cause, that said court should be held by the judge of some other district or circuit court, he shall, in writing, request the presiding judge for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States to assign a judge to hold the term or terms of said court.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

An act to authorize the Fayette Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River, Pennsylvania, from a point in the borough of Brownsville, Fayette County, to a point in the borough of West Brownsville, Washington County, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PROPOSED ISLE OF PINES INVESTIGATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair invites the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the resolution submitted by him, providing for the appointment of a committee to make a careful investigation into the condition, etc., of the Isle of Pines.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and myself have agreed that the resolution shall lie on the table until called up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4250) to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and to impose further duties thereon. The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and amended on the 26th of March, and went over in order that it might be printed as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not know what is the exact nature of the bill; but I am rather inclined to think that I agree with the Senator upon it.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not believe there is anything at all in the bill that the Senator from Texas objects to.

Mr. BAILEY. Upon that statement, I am not going to delay it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that House bill 12987, the unfinished business, be laid before the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to present an amendment which I intend to offer to the pending bill. I ask that it may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Insert the following:

"No rate or charge, regulation or practice prescribed by the Commission shall be restrained, set aside, suspended, or modified by any interlocutory or preliminary order or decree of the court, unless upon the hearing after such full notice to the Commission as herein prescribed, the same shall be considered and concurred in and ordered by at least two judges presiding in said hearing, at least one of whom shall be a judge of the circuit court of the United States or a circuit justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. In case any application, motion, or prayer for such interlocutory or preliminary order or decree shall be made by any party to such complaint other than the carrier or carriers to be affected by the rate or charge, practice or regulation in question prescribed by the Commission, then and in that case said carrier or carriers shall, before the hearing of said application, motion, or prayer, by appropriate order and process, be made a party or parties to the said complaint in equity to abide such orders and decrees as may be made by the court pending said cause and the final judgment and decree in the same. Upon the granting of any interlocutory or preliminary order or decree restraining, setting aside, suspending, or modifying any rate or charge, regulation or practice prescribed by the Commission, before said interlocutory or preliminary order or decree shall be operative or of any effect, the carrier, person, or corporation, other than a shipper or shippers, seeking such order or decree shall deposit in the registry of the court, and subject to the order thereof as hereinafter specified, the sum of $50,000, either in lawful money of the United States or in lawful bonds of the United States at the par value thereof. It shall, in addition thereto, be the duty of the said carrier or carriers to be affected by the rate or charge, practice or regulation in question to pay into the registry of the court, subject to its order, the sums of money as herein specified, and to effectuate the same, at the time of granting such preliminary or interlocutory order or decree the court shall, by appropriate order, require the said carrier or carriers affected by the rate or charge, practice or regulation in question prescribed by the Commission to pay into the registry of the court and subject to its order, on or before the 10th day of each month pending the said interlocutory or preliminary order or decree, in lawful money of the United States, all money received by such carrier or carriers during the calendar month next preceding said date and subsequent to the date of filing said complaint from the collection made for all shipments upon the rates and charges in question in excess of the rates and charges as fixed and determined by the order of said Commission. On the said 10th day of each month there shall be filed in court by said carrier or carriers, through their duly authorized officer or officers, a statement under oath of the shipments on account of which said collections have been made, setting forth in detail the character and amounts of said shipments, the point of each shipment and of its destination, the names of the consignors and consignees, the amount collected from each for said shipment, and, separately, the excess collected as aforesaid, and the names of the persons from whom collected. The said court, at the time of granting said temporary or interlocutory order or decree, and in its discretion thereafter from time to time, shall require the said carrier or carriers to give such bond and security as may be deemed sufficient to insure the filing of said reports and the payment of said amounts, and in addition thereto shall, by the orders and processes of a court of equity, enforce summarily the prompt payment of said amounts into the registry of the court, from which orders of the court there shall be no appeal. Any refusal or failure to comply with said orders and to pay into the court the said sum of money as herein provided shall constitute a contempt of the court. For the purpose of said orders the court shall be deemed to be always in session. From said orders or decrees for the payment into court of the said amounts no appeal shall lie.

"If, upon the final decree in said cause, the rate or charge prescribed by the Commission shall be adjudged to be valid, the court shall by proper orders and decrees out of the said deposit or the proceeds of the sale thereof and the additional payments made into the court by the said carrier or carriers cause to be paid to each of the persons from whom collections have been made the several amounts paid by each of them to said carrier or carriers in excess of the said rate or charges prescribed by the Commission, with interest thereon from the date of each payment at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

"If upon the final decree in said cause the rate or charge prescribed by the Commission shall be adjudged to be invalid and the enforcement of the same shall be enjoined, the court shall by proper orders and decrees direct to be paid over to the said carrier or carriers the sum of money thus theretofore deposited and paid into the registry of the court, less such amounts for costs as the court in its discretion, under the circumstances of any case, may, in justice and equity, deem to be reasonably chargeable to said carrier or carriers.

"Pending said cause, it shall be within the power of the court by appropriate proceedings, either in open court or through a master in chancery or commissioner, to examine into the correctness of the reports herein required to be made under oath by the said carrier or carriers, and to this end to examine under oath their officials and employees, and to require by order the production of the books and papers of said carrier or carriers.

"If, upon the said examination, it shall be adjudged that the said carrier or carriers have not made complete returns of all of said shipments and the amounts collected thereon, as herein specified, the court shall by order require the said carrier or carriers to pay into the registry of the court in lawful money of the United States the amount received on account of said shipments in excess of the amounts theretofore reported to the court."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, in discussing the pending measure I do not purpose entering upon any argument or attempt to prove either the necessity or the importance of additional legislation for the purpose of providing a wider and stricter regulation and control of the persons engaged or the instrumentalities employed in conducting commerce among the States. I assume that it is the consensus of opinion here, as it unquestionably is throughout the country, that legislation of such character is not only desirable, but necessary, and that we believe, as the people believe, the time has come when a more strict and systematic regulation and control of the great transportation lines of this country engaged in interstate commerce should be exercised by the Federal Government. This conviction in the public mind has been of slow growth, but it is the result of profound deliberation, thought, and study.

It would not be accurate to say that the suggestion of government control and regulation of rates, fares, and charges of transportation lines is a suggestion of a new governmental policy, because in truth it is a policy that has obtained in many of the States for a considerable period of time; it is a policy that was long since adopted by many of the leading countries of Europe, and is still adhered to in one form or another. That it is a problem replete with difficulties and perplexing questions, particularly in this country, with its wide area and vast internal commerce, is quite generally conceded. Hence it is not surprising that even among those who are most earnestly favoring legislation of this character there should be wide differences of opinion touching the methods to be employed, nor is it any impeachment of one's sincerity or zeal that his ideas upon a subject so fraught with difficulties and complex questions should not be in accord with the views or convictions of some other person or of many other persons. Nor should the public conclude that simply because the members of a legislative body, confronted with a great governmental policy or proposed policy such as this are disposed to move slowly in solving it, to study it from every possible point of view, that they are wanting in either earnestness or patriotism.

It is quite true, Mr. President, that there is a school of philosophers and magazine essayists who have discovered not the slightest difficulty in determining just exactly what should be done in this matter, and how it should be done. They do not admit that there is any excuse whatever for a moment's delay in the enactment of the legislation. I am frank to confess, Mr. President, that I am not so happily or fortunately constituted, nor am I sufficiently supplied with the quality of gray matter that is necessary to so ready and easy a solution of the grave governmental and constitutional questions which are presented by this inquiry.

I have given during the last several months such time as I have been able to spare to the study and investigation of a few only of the numerous questions involved, and I can not say that I have yet reached a perfectly satisfactory conclusion concerning all of them.

I do not expect, Mr. President, to be able to contribute a single original thought or suggestion to this discussion or to change or influence the views of any member of this body. I only hope to be able so to express my own views that I will have furnished a reasonably clear explanation of my motive for the votes that I shall cast during the progress of this legislation.

I hear Senators referred to on the one hand as railroad Senators and on the other hand as the foes or opponents of corporations. I sincerely trust that I am neither. I hope that I am a friend of railroads and of every other legitimate commercial and industrial enterprise. I would not knowingly cast a vote the effect of which would be to embarrass or cripple any legitimate industry or business. We are called upon, however, by legislation to regulate the conduct of individuals, and in a greater or less degree every character of business. That we find it necessary to exercise a higher degree of care and to provide for a wider control and regulation of so-called "public-service corporations" than of other business enterprises is due entirely to the fact that the relation of these corporations to the public is in a large degree that of governmental agencies, clothed in a great measure with governmental powers. But in enacting legislation of this character we must take care that we neither sacrifice the interests of the public, on the one hand, nor render it impossible, on the other hand, for those who have invested their money, their savings, and their earnings in these corporations to earn a just and reasonable compensation for the services that they perform. To do the one would be to prove false to the trust with which we are charged. To do the other would be at once to discredit ourselves and our country.

I have not the slightest patience with the cry that simply because a Senator favors this bill or that, or opposes this measure or that, he is necessarily and ipso facto the tool, the agent, or the representative of some peculiar or special interest. I am very confident that every Senator in this body in casting his vote upon this question, as upon every other, will so cast it as to represent, according to his best judgment and according to his conscience, the people whose duty it is for him to represent here. That there should be wide differences of opinion is not surprising. A man who comes from a purely commercial center is naturally imbued with ideas and convictions that prevail there; a man who comes from a manufacturing center is quite naturally influenced in a large measure in his convictions by the convictions that prevail there; and so a man who comes from an agricultural section is influenced largely by the views that are entertained there touching public questions and matters of legislation. Were this not true, we would not be representing our constituents. I make no pretense that my judgment is not influenced—I know it must be, though perhaps unknown to me influenced very largely—on questions of public policy by what seems to be the judgment and the wishes of the people I in part represent.

I honor the man, Mr. President, who has the courage of his convictions. It may be unpopular for the moment for him to advocate them, but I believe in the principle of eternal justice, and I believe that justice will ultimately prevail and the time will come when he will be recognized and honored because of the courage he displayed in standing for his convictions.

Mr. President, as I have said, I do not purpose entering into a discussion to show the importance of this character of legislation, nor do I purpose taking up the various and different provisions of this proposed act. The real primary purpose of this measure is to empower the Railway Commission when a rate shall be challenged, or when on investigation it shall determine that a rate or practice of a transportation company is unreasonable or unjust, to substitute therefor a just and reasonable maximum rate, or what it deems to be a just and reasonable regulation in lieu of that which has been established by the carrier. That is the prime object of this proposed legislation.

There are various provisions of the bill which are designed to aid in carrying out the main purpose, but the wording of those provisions will not become important until we shall have determined the principle upon which we shall legislate. The real controversy here, after all, is whether or not we shall provide in this bill for a judicial review of the orders of the Commission. There are some who contend that, as a matter of principle, a matter of justice, and a matter of right, there should be a broad and unlimited review by the courts. There are others who contend not only that a wise public policy requires such review, but that no bill will be in conformity to the Constitution that does not contain some such provision. On the other hand are those who contend that it is unnecessary to provide for a court review in the bill, because it is unwise, as a matter of public policy, to grant the right of review beyond what is necessary to protect the carrier in the enjoyment of his or its constitutional rights and privileges; and they contend that a law which is silent on the subject of review permits such review to the extent that it may be necessary in order to protect all of the constitutional rights of the carrier.

Again, there are some who favor the plan of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], which, in brief, is that the Commission shall be charged with the duty of prescribing and recommending reasonable rates and practices in lieu of unreasonable rates and practices established by the carrier, and if the carrier shall fail to put the rate or regulation so prescribed by the Commission in effect after due notice, it shall be the duty of the Commission to institute a suit to put in force a reasonable rate or regulation, and it shall be the duty of the court to ascertain and decree what the reasonable rate or practice is. Personally I favor practically the bill which passed the House and has been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of this Senate. If, however, a provision for unlimited review is to be adopted and attached, I will frankly say then I prefer the plan of the Senator from Ohio. It is my belief and conviction, however, that the wiser plan is to provide for no method of review, leaving the law silent on this subject, which will have the effect of making all rates and regulations of the Commission conclusive, excepting such as shall invade the constitutional rights of the carrier; that is to say, if a rate or regulation shall be of such a character as to render it impossible for the carrier complying therewith to earn a sufficient income to meet its legitimate and proper expenses, and to pay a reasonable, fair profit on the value of its property, it might be said, and probably would be said, by the courts that the rate or regulation was unreasonable to the extent that it amounted to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation.

In such case the Commission would be acting in violation of the law, because the law will require it to prescribe just and reasonable rates and regulations, and hence the carrier would have, under the general law and the Constitution, the right to restrain in a court of equity the enforcement of any such order of the Commission. I think I have now stated the real issues here.

Mr. President, it has been contended here by able lawyers that a law which is silent on the subject of court review—that is, which contains no provision authorizing a judicial review and prescribing the method therefor—is equivalent to a denial in terms of such right and is in contravention of the Constitution.

The other day, in that splendid argument made by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], by which he so charmed and instructed us all, he said:

> It is obvious that a law conferring the tremendous power which it is proposed by all the bills under consideration to confer upon the Commission, to substitute one rate or practice for another, must be drawn upon one of two theories: Upon the theory that the order of the Commission shall be final and not reviewable by the courts or upon the theory that it shall be reviewable by the courts.

If the Senator meant, as I conclude he did from that which follows, that any bill which is silent touching the right of review is necessarily a bill which denies the right of review and makes the rate and rules and regulations established by the Commission conclusive, then, much as I regret to say it, because I have the highest regard for the great abilities of the distinguished Senator, I can not agree with that conclusion; I do not believe it is a just conclusion, nor do I believe that it is sustained by the authorities.

Before passing, however, to the discussion of that question, I wish to refer for a moment to the somewhat remarkable and antagonistic arguments, not to say the inconsistencies, that our friends who are opposing this measure have drifted into during the course of this discussion. For instance, the other day when the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] was discussing his proposed amendment, a colloquy occurred between him and the Senator from Pennsylvania, during which the latter said:

> Now, in conclusion, I wish to say if there is anything in relation to this proposed rate legislation that is thoroughly misunderstood throughout the country it is this. You stop ten men on the street, and nine of them will tell you that there is a party here contending for the right to review the orders of the Commission in the court, and there is another party contending that the orders of the Commission shall be final. I say the real issue here is between this absolutely recognized, unrestricted jurisdiction of the circuit courts in the Hepburn bill and the restrictions proposed to be placed upon it both by the amendment of the Senator from Texas and the bill I had the honor to propose to the Senate.

The Senator from Texas immediately and very earnestly concurred in that statement. So we see that on the 21st day of March these two distinguished Senators were a unit in the contention that the Hepburn-Dolliver bill is wide open, fairly rioting in provisions for review, and they were joining hands in an earnest effort to restrict it within the limits of moderation and sobriety.

But later on my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, in that great argument which he delivered—and it was a great argument, one of the most beautiful to which I ever listened—said of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill:

> I have ventured the opinion heretofore that I regarded the bill under consideration unconstitutional. I now repeat that opinion, and for the following reasons:
> First. It does not provide any method for challenging the unlawfulness of the orders of the Commission in a direct proceeding against the Commission.
> Second. It prohibits the parties affected and aggrieved by the Commission's orders from defending proceedings to enforce them upon the ground of their unlawfulness.
> It is not possible to find in the bill a single word conferring jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit of any party aggrieved by any order of the Commission.

So it appears that after all the Hepburn-Dolliver bill is not such a wide-open review bill as we were told it was some days before. At that time, during the discussion of the proposed amendment by the Senator from Texas, I took occasion to suggest that in my judgment the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, being silent on the question of court review, allowed and permitted only such review as would be necessary to a party to protect his constitutional rights and privileges; that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Texas and the bill introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania each proposed to allow all the orders of the Commission to be reviewed, and, therefore, that each necessarily proposed an enlargement of the right of review over and above that provided for, contemplated, or permitted by the Hepburn-Dolliver bill. Such was my conviction then, and such is firmly my judgment now.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KITTREDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. It is just to set the Senator right. I am sorry to say that I shall be compelled to class the Senator from Oregon among the nine men out of the ten who misunderstand the situation. I expressly stated, and stated in my remarks the other day with some elaboration, that I was discussing the Hepburn-Dolliver bill as construed by its proponents and not as I construed it, because I expressly said, in referring to the fact that they claimed that there was the right to go into court, that if that were true then that right was absolutely unrestricted by the Hepburn bill. And I followed it by this expression, that "of course I am not contending that it contains any such right."

I only wish to set the Senator from Oregon right on that subject, because I know he does not wish purposely to misrepresent anything I have said.

Mr. FULTON. Certainly not. I could not do it if I would, because it is all in the RECORD, and I would not do it if I could, I assure the Senator of that. I read from the RECORD that which purported to be a quotation from what the Senator said. I have no disposition, however, to place any construction on it. I supposed that was the construction the Senator intended. It was certainly the fair construction of the language which I read.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me, and then he can make his explanation?

I was going to say that the Senator will remember that the first extract which I quoted was from his colloquy with the Senator from Texas. That is the time when he said that the Hepburn-Dolliver bill provided for unrestricted review, while his bill and the amendment of the Senator from Texas proposed to restrict the right of review. That is what I referred to. If I have misrepresented the Senator, I will be glad to have him correct me.

Mr. KNOX. Of course that which is said in colloquy must be taken in connection with that which has been said before or afterwards bearing upon the same subject and more in extenso. Prior to my interruption of the Senator from Texas the other morning, in which I used the language you have correctly read, I had already stated on a previous occasion that if the Hepburn-Dolliver bill were to be construed—and I think I read what Mr. HEPBURN said about it, and made some reference to what the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota had said about it—that if it were to be construed as they construed it, there was absolutely no limitation upon the power of the court, and the court could issue an injunction on any application without any restriction whatever, without requiring any bond to be made or any cash to be paid into the court for the protection of the shipper.

Now, the other day when I was speaking——

Mr. FULTON. I know what the Senator said later on; that is, the next time he spoke. I recall very distinctly that he then said that there is no provision for a review in the Hepburn-Dolliver bill.

Mr. KNOX. Then you understand my position correctly.

Mr. FULTON. I quoted that a moment ago. The Senator, perhaps, did not understand me. I only trust that the Senator will not think for a moment that I was endeavoring to misrepresent him.

Mr. KNOX. Certainly not.

Mr. FULTON. I would not do that, and I hope the Senator believes I would not. I thought, perhaps, from the quotations that the Senator had changed his view. It is no offense or crime for one to change his views. But I do not charge that he has done it here.

Mr. KNOX. If I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator once more——

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I will say I not only have not, but I am even more confirmed in it than ever.

Mr. FULTON. It is my contention—and that is the question I propose to discuss here—that it is not a wise public policy to grant the unlimited privilege or right of review. I am ready to concede that every man is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of his constitutional rights, and that no attempt should be made to deprive any person of his property without the just compensation required by the Constitution, but it is my conviction that under this bill, as it stands, every right of that character is fully and amply protected.

To whatever extent judicial review is necessary in order to protect a carrier in the enjoyment of his or its constitutional rights, I stand for. But manifestly, as I shall attempt to show, there are numerous regulations it will become the duty of the Commission from time to time to prescribe that are purely administrative in character. In the matter of discriminations, for instance, between persons in the sale of tickets; in the matter of passenger accommodations; in the matter of furnishing cars; in the matter of rebates, side-track connections, and numerous regulations of like character, all purely administrative, into which the questions of deprivation of property or of taking property without just compensation can not possibly enter, the orders of the Commission should be final, and they will be under this bill, for relative thereto no constitutional question can arise. Whenever constitutional rights shall be invaded the carrier will have, as I shall undertake to prove, under this bill as it now stands, the right to invoke judicial review of the Commission's orders.

That right he should have; that right we can not, and there is no attempt in this bill, to deny. Beyond that it seems to me he ought not to be permitted to go.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there anything in this bill which authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to be sued?

Mr. FULTON. No; not directly, and I do not think there is any necessity for such an authorization.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean by that that the Commission can be sued without Congressional authority?

Mr. FULTON. I think so; I have no doubt about it.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it a corporation or a court?

Mr. FULTON. It is an administrative body; that is all it is. It is certainly not a court. It may be said to possess some quasi judicial powers and some quasi legislative powers.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a governmental administrative body without any interest in the subject-matter. Does the Senator think that without any Congressional authority that body can be made defendant in a law suit?

Mr. FULTON. I have no doubt about it. I had not intended to take up that question at this point, but I would just as soon take it up here as elsewhere.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg pardon of the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. Now, in United States v. Lee (106 United States, 206) that question is discussed. I suppose, and I want to know if I understand the Senator. I assume that his contention of immunity for the Commission from suits and actions in the courts is on the ground that it is a part of the sovereign power or is exercising a part of the sovereign power and represents the nation; that it stands in such relation to the Government that it may claim the same immunity the Government enjoys in the matter of suits. Is that what the Senator contends?

Mr. SPOONER. I am asking the Senator a question.

Mr. FULTON. But I want to know what the Senator contends. At least, I should like to know. Of course the Senator is not required to say.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a governmental agency, and the power which it exercises is the power of the Government——

Mr. FULTON. Yes; and if the Government can not be sued——

Mr. SPOONER. Well, the Government can be sued, if the Government consents.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; if it consents. It can not be sued unless it does consent.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator hold that if there was nothing in the legislation which directly or inferentially authorized this agency of Government to be sued it could be sued?

Mr. FULTON. That is, if there is nothing of a specific character or by necessary implication authorizing it?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; I think it could be sued anyway. Now, let me say——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me for just a moment?

Mr. FULTON. In just a second. Let me answer the question. All questions of that character, however, simply go to the verbiage or phraseology of the bill and do not rise to the dignity or importance of a principle. So it is not really important anyway. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The issue between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Oregon would be simplified if the suggestion were made that the Senator from Wisconsin certainly does not mean by his inquiry whether the Commission could be sued to recover damages or anything of that kind, but the Senator limits the inquiry——

Mr. FULTON. Whether they can be made a party?

Mr. BACON. To the question whether the Commission is subject to legal process to restrain it from encroachment upon constitutional rights. That I understand to be the question.

Mr. FULTON. I understand that that was what the Senator meant.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I meant.

If it will not bother the Senator, I should like to say a word.

Mr. FULTON. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not by any means a mere question of verbiage. The Senator would concede that if the verbiage precluded suits against the Commission, so that there was no way in which the question could be raised in any lawsuit, because there must be parties, the plaintiff and the defendant, then the proposed act would not be valid. The question is whether the verbiage of the proposed act or of the existing law is such that the validity of an order made by the Commission can be tested in a suit in which the Commission is the defendant. That is the question.

Mr. FULTON. To which the Commission is made a party.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. What I meant by saying that it is a mere matter of verbiage or phraseology in the bill is that if it is necessary to say "in a suit for review, the Commission may be made a party," it would not affect the principle I am discussing. That provision might be inserted, and yet unrestricted review be not granted.

Mr. SPOONER. No; if that provision is not made, and if the Commission can not be sued, is it not true——

Mr. FULTON. I think unquestionably if it is true, as the Senator contends——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; I am not contending; I am asking.

Mr. FULTON. Very well; if it is true, as the Senator implies by his question, that the Commission could not be made a party to a suit to test the constitutionality of the act, and that there was no way by which you could bring the Commission into court in order to review the proceedings, I think if the proposed act denied that, it would be unconstitutional. But one would naturally wonder how the carrier would ever get it declared unconstitutional if it could not make the Commission or anybody a party to a suit.

Mr. SPOONER. If you could not make anybody a party to a suit to test the validity of the order, it would be equivalent to making the rate fixed by the Commission conclusive, would it not, and that would be unconstitutional?

Mr. FULTON. I will grant that, but I contend that the Commission may be made a party without any specific provision authorizing it. I cite the Senator, in the first place, to the case of United States v. Lee.

Mr. SPOONER. I know that case.

Mr. FULTON. No doubt the Senator knows it. In that case an action was brought in ejectment against certain Government officials, who were in possession of real estate, who answered that it was the real property of the United States. They personally made no claim of title or interest whatever to the property, they were simply in possession as agents representing the Government, holding the property for the Government. The court discussed at great length whether or not that afforded them immunity from a suit by the claimants. The court reviewed the question as to when a Government or its agent is immune against suit. It says:

> It is obvious that in our system of jurisprudence the principle is as applicable to each of the States as it is to the United States, except in those cases where by the Constitution a State of the Union may be sued in this court.

That is, by another State.

I read that simply for the purpose of showing that the same rule applies to a State that applies to the nation, and the same rule protects officials and representatives of a State that protects the United States and its representatives from being subjected to legal proceedings.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator permit me to finish from this authority?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. This authority goes on to discuss the constitutionality of the question of extending immunity to officials standing as they did in relation to Government property, and the court shows clearly that it would be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States to hold that persons standing in that relation might not be made parties defendant when a person comes into court and alleges he is being deprived of his property without just compensation.

Does the Senator claim or contend that should a carrier file his bill of complaint in equity, seeking to enjoin the Commission from enforcing an order made by it which it is alleged is in violation of that provision of the Constitution which prohibits private property being taken for a public use without just compensation, that the Commissioners could lawfully answer, "We are Government agents, and you can not sue us," and that would defeat the suit? They are Government agents at best only in the constitutional discharge of their duties. They are not Government agents when violating the Constitution. The court says further:

The objection is also inconsistent with the principle involved in the last two clauses of Article V of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, whose language is: "That no person * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

Conceding that the property in controversy in this case is devoted to a proper public use, and that this has been done by those having authority to establish a cemetery and a fort, the verdict of the jury finds that it is and was the private property of the plaintiff, and was taken without any process of law and without any compensation. Undoubtedly those provisions of the Constitution are of that character which it is intended the courts shall enforce when cases involving their operation and effect are brought before them. The instances in which the life and liberty of the citizen have been protected by the judicial writ of habeas corpus are too familiar to need citation, and many of these cases, indeed almost all of them, are those in which life or liberty was invaded by persons assuming to act under the authority of the Government. (Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall., 2.)

If this constitutional provision is a sufficient authority for the court to interfere to rescue a prisoner from the hands of those holding him under the asserted authority of the Government, what reason is there that the same courts shall not give remedy to the citizen whose property has been seized without due process of law and devoted to public use without just compensation?

I call the Senator's attention to that, and then I call his attention also to the case of Reagan v. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, with which the Senator is perfectly familiar also. It is found in 154 United States, page 388. In that case suit was brought against the railway commission of the State of Texas and the attorney-general of the State to enjoin them from enforcing the orders made by the commission prescribing a schedule of rates; and I want you to keep in mind that the Supreme Court said in 106 United States, from which I have just read, that the same rule applies to the State, under this doctrine of immunity from suit, that applies to the General Government. Now, with that enunciation of the doctrine in mind, I invite your attention to what the court said in 154 United States, as to whether the railroad commissioners might be made parties to a suit to review the orders of the Commission:

We are met at the threshold with an objection—that this is in effect a suit against the State of Texas, brought by a citizen of another State, and, therefore, under the eleventh amendment to the Constitution, beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal court. The question as to when an action against officers of a State is to be treated as an action against the State has been of late several times carefully considered by this court.

Of course if there had been consent by the State to be sued, there would have been no need of discussing this proposition in that case, and hence we may assume there was no such consent.

The question as to when an action against officers of a State is to be treated as an action against the State has been of late several times carefully considered by the court, especially in the cases of In re Ayers (123 U. S., 443) by Mr. Justice Matthews, and Pennoyer v. McConnaughy (140 U. S., 1) by Mr. Justice Lamar.

They then review the authorities at some length, and conclude thus:

Appellants invoke the doctrines laid down in these two quotations and insist that this action can not be maintained because the real party against which alone in fact the relief is asked and against which the judgment or decree effectively operates is the State, and also because the statute under which the defendants acted and proposed to act is constitutional, and that the action of State officers under a constitutional statute is not subject to challenge in the Federal court. We are unable to yield our assent to this argument. So far from the State being the only real party in interest, and upon whom alone the judgment effectively operates, it has in a pecuniary sense no interest at all.

Then, continuing, they say:

It is not nearly so much affected by the decree in this case as it would be by an injunction against officers staying the collection of taxes, and yet a frequent and unquestioned exercise of jurisdiction of courts, State and Federal, is in restraining the collection of taxes, illegal in whole or in part. Neither will the constitutionality of the statute, if that be conceded, avail to oust the Federal court of jurisdiction. A valid law may be wrongfully administered by officers of the State, and so as to make such administration an illegal burden and exaction upon the individual.

And that is what I want to call the Senator's particular attention to. A valid law may be unconstitutionally administered by the Commission, and when they step outside of their statutory authority they cease to be entitled to plead their official character as Government agents and immunity from suit.

The court further says:

A tax law, as it leaves the legislative hands, may not be obnoxious to any challenge, and yet the officers charged with the administration of that valid tax law may so act under it in the matter of assessment or collection as to work an illegal trespass upon the property rights of the individual.

And so I say here, these Commissioners might so execute the trust confided to them as to trespass upon the property and rights of the individual, the carrier.

They may go beyond the powers thereby conferred, and when they do so the fact that they are assuming to act under a valid law will not oust the courts of jurisdiction to restrain their excessive and illegal acts.

And in Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 518), which was also a suit to enjoin a railroad commission, the court said:

Another question of a preliminary character must be here noticed. The answer of the officers of the State in each case insists that the real party in interest is the State, and that these suits are, in effect, suits against the State, of which the circuit court of the United States can not take jurisdiction consistently with the eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States. This point is, perhaps, covered by the general assignments of error, but it was not discussed at the bar by the representatives of the State board. It would therefore be sufficient to say that these are cases of which, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, the circuit court has jurisdiction not only upon the ground of the diverse citizenship or alienage of the parties, but upon the further ground that as the statute of Nebraska, under which the State board of transportation proceeds, is assailed as being repugnant to rights secured to the plaintiffs by the Constitution of the United States, the cases may be regarded as arising under that instrument. But to prevent misapprehension we add that, within the meaning of the eleventh amendment of the Constitution, the suits are not against the State, but against certain individuals charged with the administration of a State enactment, which, it is alleged, can not be enforced without violating the constitutional rights of the plaintiffs. It is the settled doctrine of this court that a suit against individuals for the purpose of preventing them as officers of a State from enforcing an unconstitutional enactment to the injury of the rights of the plaintiff is not a suit against the State within the meaning of the amendment. (Pennoyer v. McConnaughy, 140 U. S., 1, 10; In re Tyler, 149, U. S., 164, 190; Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S., 58, 68; Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S., 204, 220.)

Now, if that is true of a State commission, and if it is true, as the Supreme Court says, that State officers are entitled to the same protection under this rule of immunity from suit that United States officials are, I ask the Senator why that doctrine does not apply to a commission created by Congress?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me for a moment?

Mr. FULTON. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. With reference to the case of the United States against Lee, that was an action of ejectment——

Mr. FULTON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Brought by the owner against certain persons in possession of Arlington, the homestead of General Lee.

Mr. FULTON. Against certain officials.

Mr. SPOONER. Against certain persons. Of course, in an action of ejectment the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title and not because of the weakness of his adversary's title. The defendants answered, and it was otherwise brought to the attention of the court by the Attorney-General, that these officials, the defendants, were holding for the Government of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States upheld in that case the doctrine that except where Congress has provided the United States can not be sued. But——

That doctrine has no application to officers and agents of the United States who, when as such holding for public uses possession of property, are sued therefor by a person claiming to be the owner thereof or entitled thereto; but the lawfulness of that possession and the right or title of the United States to the property may, by a court of competent jurisdiction, be the subject-matter of inquiry and adjudged accordingly.

If that had not been the law, although the tax for which the homestead of General Lee had been sold had been tendered, he would have been remediless. The right to bring an action of ejectment against persons in possession is one thing. The right to bring suit to enjoin a governmental body—an administrative body, if you please—which has under authority of law fixed the price, a just compensation, which its owner is entitled to for private property taken for public use, is another thing, is it not?

Mr. FULTON. There may be a distinction, but I doubt if there is a difference.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will look at the McChord case, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, he will see, I think, for he is an excellent lawyer, that there is not only a distinction, but a difference.

Mr. FULTON. I have looked at the McChord case.

Mr. SPOONER. And is it not wise, in view of the fact that it is the purpose of Congress (and if it is not the purpose of Congress the proposed act would be void beyond any possible question) to furnish an opportunity to raise the question in the courts of the United States, to make it clear in the statute by adequate provision, that it may be done? That is my point.

Mr. FULTON. I stated to the Senator that was a mere question of wording which does not one way or the other enter at all into the principle for which I am contending. But I have no guardianship over this bill, and I have no objection to any amendment of it that will make this proposition perfectly clear to grant the consent, if you please, of Congress to make the Commission a party to any suit necessary to protect the carrier in the enjoyment of his constitutional rights and the possession of his property. Some such amendment as that I would have no objection to. But I do hold that it is not necessary. I can not admit that it is necessary. I contend that this principle of immunity of the sovereign power from suits in the courts does not extend to Government agents such as these Commissioners would be, and I think the cases I have read in connection with the Reagan case and Smyth v. Ames very clearly show that.

Will the Senator tell me whether there is any difference in the relation occupied by a railroad commission of a State created by the State legislature to the State than the relation of a commission created by Congress to the General Government? The relation of the one to the sovereign power that creates it is exactly the relation of the other to the sovereign power that creates it. If a suit may be maintained to restrain a State commission from the exercise of unconstitutional and unwarranted powers, without the consent of the State equally and upon the same principle a suit may be maintained against a commission created by Congress to restrain it from the exercise of unconstitutional and unwarranted and usurped power.

But that is really not a very material question, because if it be a defect in the bill it is one that is easily remedied without destroying the principle for which its friends contend.

Now, Mr. President, I was diverted by that suggestion——

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator leaves that question, I just want to throw out a suggestion for the discussion of my two learned legal friends here to see how they will handle it. I am just reading here section 3224, which relates to the collection of internal-revenue taxes:

No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court.

Now, there is a direct prohibition against a court intermeddling with the collection of taxes. Taxes are levied by Congressional action, by law, and the officers of the Government assess and collect them. Here is a direct prohibition that such officers shall not be intermeddled with by the courts either by a suit or by a restraining order. I just want to know if that applies at all in this connection.

Mr. FULTON. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that I can not myself see that it has any application here.

Mr. TILLMAN. Here are the officers of the Government who are going to collect these taxes. Are they not acting under an act of Congress, and would not this Commission which does this duty of lowering a rate be a creature of Congress? If you can not sue one, why do you have to sue the other to get your law constitutional?

Mr. FULTON. The Senator, I think, has probably this idea, that by analogy——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am reading it by analogy only.

Mr. FULTON. The legislative power had to make a prohibition against suits being maintained against tax collectors in order to prevent such suits.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FULTON. Therefore if a suit might be maintained in the absence of a prohibition against the tax collector (as such legislation assumes), it might be maintained against persons occupying the relation of this Commission. I suppose that is the Senator's idea.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the idea I had in mind. The Senator from Wisconsin is contending that it will be unconstitutional for us to pass an act here that does not recognize the right to sue this creature of Congress. I just wanted to know why the same principle will not apply in the collection of taxes, which are levied by Congress, just as the rate will be fixed by Congressional action.

Mr. FULTON. I feel justified in saying on behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin that he has abandoned that contention.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. TILLMAN. I leave you two gentlemen, then, to discuss it.

Mr. FULTON. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin had abandoned it, or would under the light of the authorities I have cited and quoted.

Mr. SPOONER. I say this—and the Senator from Oregon agrees with me; he must do so——

Mr. FULTON. I must if you say so.

Mr. SPOONER. You must, because you are a good lawyer.

Mr. FULTON. When the Senator says that, I must agree to anything.

Mr. SPOONER. If there were no provision made for testing the lawfulness of an order made by the Commission in the courts—and I know no way by which that could be done except by authorizing suit to be brought against the Commission—the act would not be valid.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me——

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It will take but a moment.

Mr. FULTON. That is all right.

Mr. SPOONER. Exception has been made in all the decisions between a proceeding for the collection of taxes, which, in the very nature of things, must be summary, and a proceeding to take property for public use. In other words, the exercise or the quasi-exercise directly of the power of eminent domain.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; there is unquestionably a distinction.

Mr. TILLMAN. Congress is empowered under the Constitution to collect taxes and to regulate commerce. Both these powers are in the same section. It is a part of the power of Congress to levy taxes and to regulate commerce. Under the power to levy taxes the officers, the creatures of Congress in levying and collecting taxes, are protected even against being sued, much less against being enjoined, and they go right forward and take private property for public use, and the taxpayer has no redress whatever.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator ought to know that the tax proceeding is entirely different. Under the decisions——

Mr. TILLMAN. There you come with your decisions. I am getting back to the common sense of it now.

Mr. SPOONER. Where the Senator's common sense differs from the legal——

Mr. TILLMAN. Of a common sense.

Mr. SPOONER. No; from the common sense of the legal standpoint of the Supreme Court of the United States. I, with due deference to him——

Mr. TILLMAN. Brush mine aside, of course.

Mr. SPOONER. I feel constrained to give greater respect to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. I say to the Senator the Supreme Court has made a clear distinction, so far as due process is concerned, between the collection of taxes and the sale of property for a nonpayment of taxes and the exercise of the power which is under discussion here.

Mr. FULTON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FULTON. If I may be allowed to exercise my function of umpire and declare this a draw, I will proceed with my argument.

Mr. SPOONER. You declare it a draw?

Mr. FULTON. I really think the Senator from Wisconsin has the better of the argument up to this time, but I do not know how long that will continue and therefore I want to stop the contest.

Now, in line with the question we were discussing of the right of a party to prosecute a suit in equity and make the Commission a party without the consent of the Commission or without the consent of Congress, and without any provision of law authorizing it, I call the Senator's attention to the opinion of Justice Miller in concurring in the case of Chicago, etc., Railway Company v. Minnesota, page 459 of 134 United States Reports, being the case we commonly refer to as the "Minesota case." It was a case where the railway commission of Minnesota had prescribed certain rates which the supreme court of the State of Minnesota held were conclusive. That court held that the court could not inquire into the justice or injustice of such rates, but that they were conclusive on the court and must stand. The Supreme Court of the United States held, of course, that if that was the true construction of the statute it was unconstitutional, and that it (the Federal Supreme Court) is bound by the construction placed on a State statute by the supreme court of such State, which, of course, is the acknowledged rule. But Justice Miller, while he said he concurred with some hesitation in the judgment of the court reversing the case, made this statement:

1. In regard to the business of common carriers limited to points within a single State, that State has the legislative power to establish the rates of compensation for such carriage.

2. The power which the legislature has to do this can be exercised through a commission which it may authorize to act in the matter, such as the one appointed by the legislature of Minnesota by the act now under consideration.

He then states that the rate, however fixed, must have in mind the fact that property may not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Then he discusses the proposition as to the remedy in case it is contended that the rates fixed do operate to deprive the party of his property without just compensation. Justice Miller was rather disposed to contend that the question could not be raised in defending a mandamus suit, which was the proceeding employed by the Commission, but finally concurred and agreed that the question might be raised when such was the character of the suit brought by the Commission to enforce its orders. He said, however—

That the proper—

Bear this in mind—

6. That the proper, if not the only, mode of judicial relief against the tariff of rates established by the legislature or by its commission is by a bill in chancery asserting its unreasonable character and its conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and asking a decree of court forbidding the corporation from exacting such fare as excessive or establishing its right to collect the rates as being within the limits of a just compensation for the service rendered.

Keep in mind the fact that there was no provision in the Minnesota statute providing for a court review.

Justice Miller was unquestionably one of the greatest jurists that ever occupied a seat on the Supreme Bench. He points out that a suit in equity to restrain the Commission is the proper, if not the only, remedy in such a case. I have shown that the same principle was announced in Smyth v. Ames, above cited.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to hurry on, because I had not expected, when I began, to speak so long as I have, although I have not done all of the speaking. The point I particularly desire to discuss is the proposition that it is not necessary to the validity of a bill of this character that it shall contain a specific provision for a court review. What is the character of that power? Is it a limited or is it an unlimited power? Is it a purely legislative power or is it quasi judicial?

Manifestly, I think, under the decisions, the power to prescribe a schedule of rates for the future is a purely legislative power. If that be true, how can it be said that it is necessary in the exercise of a purely legislative power to provide for a court review?

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FULTON. In just a second, and then I will yield.

We commit to this Commission, to this administrative board, by virtue of the legislative power of this body, the right to prescribe rates. The matter of making rates, the matter of prescribing a schedule of rates, is a legislative power, admittedly. Why, then, in the exercise of that power, must we specifically provide some method for reviewing the action of that board? Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the Commission can exercise the legislative power, to which the Senator is now alluding, they must declare that certain rates are unreasonable. Is that a legislative power?

Mr. FULTON. Is it a legislative power?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; deciding the question whether rates are reasonable or unreasonable.

Mr. FULTON. In the matter of prescribing future rates——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not talking about prescribing rates. I say they must find in the first instance that certain rates now in existence made by the carriers are unreasonable. Is that a legislative power?

Mr. FULTON. The matter of prescribing rates for the future is a legislative power, but I would not say that the power to be exercised by this Commission is a legislative power. It is purely an administrative power; that is all it is—the power to be exercised by the Commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. Have not the courts said——

Mr. FULTON. Of course it is on the border line of legislation. All these powers blend at a certain point, and it is very difficult to define them absolutely. It may properly be described as the exercise of quasi legislative power.

Mr. ALDRICH. Has not the Supreme Court said over and over again that the power to declare a rate unreasonable was a judicial power? Has not the court said so in numberless cases?

Mr. FULTON. Yes; the Supreme Court has said that, but the Senator must take into consideration the circumstances and the character of the case in which the court said it. The court has said time and again, it said in the Reagan case, and has said in numerous cases, that the power to prescribe future rates is a legislative power. The power to determine the reasonableness of a rate when that question is in litigation or when that question is disputed, is a judicial power certainly.

But I am not talking about that. I am talking about the exercise of the legislative power of prescribing a future rate. I am not discussing now even whether that power may be committed to a commission. I have assumed for the purpose of the argument that it may be committed to a commission. I think no one seriously questions but that it may be committed to a commission. Then if Congress may commit to the extent proposed here to a commission the power to prescribe such rates, in doing that it is the exercise by Congress of a legislative power, and it is unnecessary to provide for any method of review.

Now, when the question of the reasonableness of a rate is raised, when it is sought to review the action of the Commission and it is contended that the rate prescribed is unreasonably low, that it amounts to confiscation under the Constitution, then a judicial question is presented and the court must determine it. But the party raises that question under the Constitution and by virtue of his constitutional rights, and it does not require any act of Congress to authorize him to avail himself of his constitutional privilege. That is what I contend.

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose the rate is unreasonably high? Suppose it is extortionate?

Mr. FULTON. I do not think the railroads are worrying about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not talking about railroads. The anxiety of the Senator from Oregon, I take it, is not for the railroads.

Mr. FULTON. My anxiety is——

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose the shipper finds the rate fixed by the Commission to be extortionate, what remedy has he unless there is some specific power given to him to have a review?

Mr. FULTON. I suppose that the shipper has no remedy unless there is power given to him to review. I think not, because his constitutional rights would not be infringed. His property would not be taken for any public use.

Now, I want to go back just a moment before I proceed. I answered the Senator that I did not think the railroads were worrying about that. I did not mean to say that the Senator is advocating the cause of the railroads. I thought afterwards that the remark might be so construed. I was arguing from the standpoint of the carrier at the moment, and that is what caused me to make the remark.

The shipper is placed in a different position. He is bound absolutely by the rate made by the Congress, because his constitutional rights are not invaded. But I do not think there is any danger that the shipper's rights, constitutional or otherwise, are going to be infringed in any respect by the action of this Commission. I do not think that anyone is dreading lest the Commission shall make the rates to be charged by the railroads and transportation lines too high. If they shall do that, it will be time to provide a remedy against it when they shall have done so. To provide a remedy for the shipper to review the orders of the Commission would be a fruitless and useless task, because it is utterly impractical for the shipper to prosecute cases of that character. That is the reason why we are proposing to constitute this Commission with power to prosecute such cases. It is because the Commission has the Government behind it and can better bear the expense necessarily entailed by such a prosecution. If it were left to the individual shipper to enforce these laws, if it were left to the individual shipper to prosecute a suit to reduce a rate that is put in practice by a railroad, the suits would never be prosecuted and the rates would never be reduced, because the shipper could not afford the expense of following up the litigation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think the shipper ought to be left powerless against exactions by the Commission?

Mr. FULTON. I think if the shipper were complaining against the action of the Commission it would be proper enough to give him a remedy, but I think it is unnecessary to talk about the shipper being left powerless when the shipper is not complaining. The shipper is asking us to give to the Commission the power to fix and regulate the rates. The shippers are not calling on us to give them the power of review.

Mr. ALDRICH. Who is authorized here to speak and to say that?

Mr. FULTON. Anyone who reads the papers and is informed of the current opinion and sentiment of the country.

Mr. ALDRICH. We are acting here upon our judgment, I assume, and so as to protect the rights of all.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator must speak for himself as to how he is acting. I will not undertake to do so. I can tell him, if he wants an answer to his inquiry, how I am acting and why I have the views I entertain.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator assumes that under the present law—and, as I understand him, he is opposing any amendment in that direction—the shipper is left powerless as against the exaction of extortionate rates. I do not propose to consent to a bill which does not give the same remedy to the shipper that, in the opinion of the Senator from Oregon, exists on the part of the carrier.

Mr. FULTON. I say I am ready to give the shippers any necessary remedy whenever it shall appear that the shipper is suffering any wrong. The particular wrong of which the shipper is now complaining is of the excessive rates made by the railroads. The shipper could, without any law being passed by Congress, avail himself of the right he has at common law to go into court and to enjoin a rate made by the railroad company that he alleged and could prove was excessive and unreasonable.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. He has that right without any action of Congress, but we all know that it is a right without any value to him.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I expected the Senator to say.

Mr. FULTON. It is utterly without any value to him because he can not afford to do it. Now, the shippers are not asking us to give them a remedy against the orders of the Commission. If the Senator wants to incorporate in the bill a provision that will authorize the shipper as well to appeal to the courts when a rate made either by the railroad or by the Commission shall be unreasonable and unjust as to the shipper, I care nothing about that. The Senator knows as well as I know that that is not the heart of this controversy. That it is mere diversion. That the heart of this controversy is, Shall we give the Commission the power to lower or fix a maximum rate of charges or to prescribe a just and reasonable rule when it finds that the one in force by the railroad is unjust and unreasonable?

I was about to say when interrupted by the Senator from Rhode Island that while it is not necessary to cite the authorities in order to show the power that Congress has in the matter of regulating commerce among the States, and hence to prescribe rates, I have a few citations here.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the Senator from Oregon leaves that point, I desire to suggest to him as to whether it is likely a shipper would appeal to the Commission to get the Commission to raise railroad rates over what the railroad had themselves fixed?

Mr. FULTON. That is a very pertinent suggestion.

Mr. ALDRICH. As that inquiry seems to be in reply to a question which I asked, I will state to the Senator from Illinois it might happen that if the Commission should become favorable in the course of time to the railroads and the rights of the shippers invaded by their action, the rate might be, for instance, a dollar from Chicago to New York and the shipper contend that 60 cents was a reasonable rate. The Commission might fix 95 cents and the shipper would be absolutely powerless to have the rate set aside as extortionate and unreasonably high. In such a case you propose to leave the shipper without remedy.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I disagree entirely with the Senator from Rhode Island on that proposition. The court is open to the shipper now and will be after this bill, if it is properly enacted, becomes a law.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course; and the shipper can commence suit at common law against the carrier or against the Commission. But what value is that? What value has it ever been?

Mr. HOPKINS. Does not the Senator remember that the only object of a court is to set aside a rate that is fixed by the Commission? Then it goes back to the Commission for another hearing. But the court would not fix 95 cents if 60 cents was a reasonable rate; it would simply find that a dollar was an unreasonable rate and then remit it back to the Commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. The court does not fix any rate. I am not talking about that.

Mr. HOPKINS. It vacates the order or affirms it, as the case may be.

Mr. ALDRICH. They have a right to say after a proper review that 95 cents was an unreasonable rate, and then the Commission would have to fix a reasonable rate, or rather the same complaint would have to be gone over again before the Commission.

Mr. HOPKINS. All the court does is either to affirm or vacate the order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I still insist that the shipper is not worried over the possibility of the rates fixed by the Commission being made higher than they are at present under the railroad rate-making power. Whenever the shippers begin to complain that there is danger that the Commission will increase the rate prescribed by the railroad companies, then it will be time enough to consider the suggestion of giving extended powers to the shipper in order to protect his rights and interests.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from Oregon is aware that I have made no such suggestion.

Mr. FULTON. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. And it is simply disposing of a man of straw that I have not raised.

Mr. FULTON. It is purely academic, as I think has been most of the discussion which has grown out of the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island.

I will now return to the proposition that it is unnecessary to insert any provision in this law for a review; that an act that is silent on that subject is valid under the Constitution.

But first let me say again that it is my contention that the Hepburn-Dolliver bill does not deny the carrier the privilege of having any order of the Commission reviewed which he contends is violative of his constitutional right, and hence it recognizes his right so to do. To attempt to deny him such right would doubtless render the measure unconstitutional. We want that he shall have that right, but we do not want that he shall have the right of review for any other purpose. I might not oppose an amendment which in terms restricts the right of review to a judicial inquiry into the constitutionality of an order and provided for the early hearing and determination of the case. Beyond that I can not go, and that is not necessary in order to insure the validity of this measure. Indeed, I can not but doubt the wisdom of attempting to frame any such provision. Better leave the bill as it is in that respect, and let the courts describe the limit. The authorities that have been cited in support of the contention that a statute of this character, which does not provide specifically for a review, is unconstitutional, refer entirely to statutes that in terms made the rates of the Commission conclusive. I shall now undertake to show that a statute which is silent as to court review recognizes the right of a carrier to have reviewed any order which invades his constitutional rights, and hence is a valid exercise of legislative power.

To what extent, then, is Congress vested with the power to prescribe future rates? Is it an independent power—a power vested solely in the legislative branch of the Government, or is it a mixed power, quasi legislative, quasi judicial? Manifestly, it is purely and essentially a legislative power. It grows out of and is derived solely from the power vested in the Congress by the Constitution to "regulate commerce among the States."

But gentlemen tell us that it may not be exercised unless specific provision be made for a court of review. How can that be if it is a legislative power? Will it be contended that the Congress can not exercise unquestioned legislative powers without in each instance specially providing for a court review? Does the validity of legislative enactments or the right of a citizen to protection in the enjoyment of his constitutional rights depend upon such provision? Does the pending bill propose an unlawful or unconstitutional act? Is it proposed to commit to the Commission the power to do aught else than make reasonable and just rates and regulations? Certainly not. Is it not within the constitutional power of Congress to prescribe reasonable rates and regulations? Certainly. We are told, however, that the Commission may prescribe unjust and unreasonable rates or regulations. If it shall, would not its action be in violation of the law? Would it be the fault of the statute that the Commission had exceeded its power? Surely not. Can not the courts confine and restrict its actions to the exercise of its legitimate power? Then why must the law provide a method of appeal from or review of the Commission's orders? If the Commission shall make only such orders as the statute authorizes it to make, there will be no occasion for a review. Why must we assume that it will do otherwise? If it shall attempt to make orders or prescribe regulations in excess of, beyond, or in violation of its powers, its action would be void and enforcement of any such order would be restrained by the court. It is to me a strange doctrine, and new entirely, that a commission or administrative board may exceed its authority, and yet there exists no method of reviewing and restraining its orders in such behalf, unless the method of review be provided in the act creating the board and prescribing its authority.

The contention that no act of Congress authorizing a Commission to prescribe rates and regulations can be constitutionally enacted unless a provision for a court review is incorporated in the statute, assumes and implies that the power of Congress to regulate fares and practices of common carriers is a power that Congress can exercise only as an auxiliary or assistant to the court.

While I do not deem it necessary to cite authorities in support of the power of Congress to regulate rates, yet in view of the contention that any act which does not provide for a review of the Commission's orders by the courts will be unconstitutional, it seems to me it will prove profitable briefly to inquire what the powers and jurisdiction of Congress in that behalf are. Is it a subject over which the power of Congress is plenary and supreme? If so, then it is my contention that whether Congress shall act directly in the matter of prescribing regulations for and fixing rates of common carriers, or shall act through a duly constituted commission, it is independent of the courts, and there is no power on earth that may lawfully question, set aside, or suspend its decrees. There are, of course, certain constitutional limitations that operate not on Congress alone, but as well on every Department and agency of Government. For instance, private property may not be taken for a public use unless just compensation be first paid or certainly and securely provided. And no person may be deprived of his property except by due process of law. But here the taking of private property is not contemplated, nor is it proposed to deprive any person or corporation of its property, either by process of law or otherwise.

If any order of the Commission shall amount to such taking or deprivation, it will be in contravention and in violation of this proposed statute, as well as of the Constitution, and, therefore, not pursuant to the statute or by virtue thereof. Hence, any such order would be outside of the statute and its enforcement would be restrained at the suit of the party whose property was proposed thus unlawfully to be taken. The jurisdiction to hear and determine such a case need not be given in this act, for it contemplates no such case, and jurisdiction in such case is amply provided for in the judiciary act, for it would be a case "arising under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress.

As I have stated, Mr. President, that, while I do not deem it necessary to go into the history of the judicial decisions touching the powers of Congress in the matter of regulating interstate commerce, still, in order to show that its power in that behalf is absolutely supreme, that it knows no limitation except in so far as the provision of the Constitution against the taking of private property for public use without compensation is a limitation, I will now briefly cite certain authorities on that proposition.

In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 9) Justice Marshall, speaking of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, said:

> It is the power to regulate—that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms, and do not affect the questions which arise in this case or which have been discussed at the bar. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

In the Northern Securities Company v. United States Justice Harlan, affirming the decree, said:

> Is there, then, any escape from the conclusion that, subject only to such restrictions, the power of Congress over interstate and international commerce is as full and complete as is the power of any State over its domestic commerce?

In the same case Mr. Justice White said:

> At the outset the absolute correctness is admitted of the declaration of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations "is complete in itself and may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations;" and that if the end to be accomplished is within the scope of the Constitution, "all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end and which are not prohibited are constitutional."
> The plenary authority of Congress over interstate commerce, its right to regulate it to the fullest extent, to fix rates to be charged for the movement of the interstate commerce, to legislate concerning the ways and vehicles actually engaged in such traffic, and to exert any and every power over such commerce which flows from the authority conferred by the Constitution, is thus accorded.

In Kentucky and I. Bridge Company v. The Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company (37 Fed., 634) Mr. Justice Jackson, after quoting from Gibbons v. Ogden, said:

> Possessing such sovereign and exclusive power over the subject of commerce among the States, it is difficult to understand why Congress may not legislate in respect thereto to the same extent, both as to rates and all other matters of regulation, as the States may do in respect to purely local or internal commerce.

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company, Mr. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> Before the passage of the act it was generally believed that there were great abuses in railroad management and railroad transportation, and the grave question which Congress had to consider was how those abuses could be corrected and what control should be taken of the business of such corporations. The present inquiry is limited to the question as to what it determined should be done with reference to the matter of rates. There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable. There is nothing in the act fixing rates. Congress did not attempt to exercise that power, and if we examine the legislative and public history of the day it is apparent that there was no serious thought of doing so.

In Stone v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, Mr. Chief Justice Waite, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> It is now settled in this court that a State has power to limit the amount of charges by railroad companies for the transportation of persons and property within its own jurisdiction, unless restrained by some contract in the charter, or unless what is done amounts to a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce. (Railroad Co. v. Maryland, 21 Wall., 456; Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S., 164; Winona and St. Peter Railroad Co. v. Blake, 94 U. S., 180; Ruggles v. Illinois, 108 U. S., 526–531.)

It will be seen, Mr. President, from the authorities already cited, that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is unrestricted, is as ample and complete as is the power of a State to regulate its domestic commerce—that States may regulate rates, and hence the power of Congress to prescribe rates in the exercise of its power to regulate interstate commerce is clear. If this is true, how can it be reasonably contended that in order to exercise such power it must provide specifically for a method of judicial review?

Mr. President, the contention of the Senator from Pennsylvania the other day was that under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Minnesota case, as reported in 134 United States, a law which does not contain a specific method of review is necessarily in conflict with the Constitution. I deny that the doctrine of the Minnesota case justifies any such contention, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to what the Minnesota case is.

I stated a few moments ago that the legislature of Minnesota enacted a law granting to a railroad commission certain powers. Among those powers was the power to prescribe reasonable rates and regulations for transportation lines. Under that power the Minnesota commission did prescribe rates. A mandamus proceeding was brought to put in force as against the railroad company the schedule of rates made by that commission. The railroad company appeared, filed its answer, and alleged that the rates it had in force were reasonable, and that the rates prescribed by the railroad commission were unreasonable to the extent that they deprived the railroad of its property without just compensation or due process of law. But the supreme court of Minnesota held that under the statute the rates fixed by the railroad commission were absolutely conclusive, and would not admit testimony to show them to be confiscatory. The case went up to the Supreme Court of the United States. That court held that the statute of the State of Minnesota as construed by the supreme court of Minnesota was void. The court intimated all through its decision that in its judgment the supreme court of Minnesota had erroneously construed the statute.

The statute did not in terms say that the rates fixed by the commission should be conclusive, but the supreme court of Minnesota gave the statute that construction, and the Supreme Court of the United States said that, under the well-known rule, it is bound by the construction of a State statute given to it by the highest court of the State enacting it. It must treat the law as if it had had the decision of the supreme court of Minnesota incorporated into it, and therefore prohibiting by its terms the reasonableness of rates established by the commission being inquired into. But even then the Supreme Court of the United States did not hold the statute to be void. They held that as construed by the supreme court of Minnesota it was in conflict with the Federal Constitution, and concluded in these words:

> In view of the opinion delivered by that court it may be impossible for any further proceedings to be taken other than to dismiss the proceeding for a mandamus, if the court should adhere to its opinion—> that, under the statute, it can not investigate judicially the reasonableness of the rates fixed by the commission. Still, the question will be open for review.

Mind you—

That is, the supreme court of Minnesota might conclude that it had construed the statute erroneously. The statute of Minnesota contained no provision for a review. There was not a word about review in the statute.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In other words, if the Senator will permit me, the supreme court of Minnesota construed the law as being not only that the rates as fixed by the commission were conclusive, but as denying the right of review.

Mr. FULTON. The supreme court of Minnesota construed the law, as the Senator says, as denying the right of review. The Supreme Court of the United States intimates all through its decision that that construction was incorrect, but it said that it was bound by it. The point I want to make is that the Supreme Court of the United States did not say that because that statute contained no provision for a review it was void, but they said if the construction of the statute by the supreme court of Minnesota was correct, namely, that thereunder there could be no judicial inquiry, then it was unconstitutional; but if the supreme court of Minnesota shall conclude that such is not the proper construction of the law, then the statute is constitutional, notwithstanding it contains no provision for a review. That is the case upon which the Senator from Pennsylvania based his entire argument—that a statute which provides no method for a review is necessarily unconstitutional. I submit the case does not bear out or support that contention, but in truth supports the contrary contention.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania also made this further contention. In giving his reasons why this statute is in violation of the Constitution, he said:

Third. It so heavily penalizes the disobedience of the Commission's orders as to make any attempt to secure a judicial hearing in any form of proceeding impracticable.

Mr. President, that same question was raised in the Reagan case. The same contention was put forward there, and what did the court say? The court, after discussing the contention that the penalties were so extreme that they amounted to a denial of the right of review, and hence amounted to making the rate prescribed by the Commission conclusive, said:

It is enough to say in respect to these matters, at least so far as this case is concerned, that it is not to be supposed that the legislature of any State, or a commission appointed under the authority of any State, will ever engage in a deliberate attempt to cripple or destroy institutions of such great value to the community as the railroads, but will always act with the sincere purpose of doing justice to the owners of railroad property as well as to other individuals, and also that no legislation of a State as to the mode of proceeding in its own courts can abridge or modify the powers existing in the Federal courts, sitting as courts of equity.

* * * * * * *

We do not deem it necessary to pass upon these specific objections, because the fourteenth section or any other section—

That was a section prescribing penalties—prescribing penalties may be dropped from the statute without affecting the validity of the remaining portions; and if the rates established by the Commissioner are not conclusive, they are at least prima facie evidence of what is reasonable and just. For the purpose of this case it may be conceded that both the clauses are unconstitutional, and still the great body of the act remains unchallenged—that which establishes the Commission and empowers it to make reasonable rates and regulations for the control of railroads. It is a familiar law that one section or part of an act may be invalid without affecting the validity of the remaining portion of the statute. Any independent provision may be thus dropped out if that which is left is fully operative as a law.

Thus it will be seen the court held that the mere fact that the penalties were excessive; the mere fact that they might, if absolutely enforced, amount to a denial of the right of the party to question the conclusiveness of rates made by the Commission, was not sufficient to justify the court in holding the law unconstitutional and void, because they say that those provisions themselves in such a case would be unconstitutional, but their invalidity would not affect any other portion of the law. So I say here, if the contention of the Senator from Pennsylvania be correct—that the penalty provisions amount to a denial of the right of the party to question the conclusiveness of the rate—that does not argue against the validity of the statute authorizing the making of rates, but it argues simply against the validity of those sections fixing the penalty. They may go out and the rest of the law stand.

Mr. President, I will not take up some questions that I had contemplated discussing, because this discussion has been drawn out to a much greater length than I had contemplated.

I want to say, in conclusion, that if I thought the omission from this law of a specific method of review would result in doing one particle of injustice or wrong to the railroad companies or to any transportation line, I would not favor such legislation for a single moment. But, Mr. President, there can be no doubt but that under this law every transportation company will have ample means and ample machinery to test the validity and constitutionality of any rate that shall be prescribed by the Commission. If they shall contend that any rate prescribed by the Commission or any order made by the Commission amounts to a taking of property without due process of law, they have ample remedy to test that question without a specific provision being placed in the law.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FULTON. I do.

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether the Senator in the course of his remarks has covered the point to which I now direct his attention, but it is within the range of possibility, if not probability, that the time may come when parties interested other than the railroad companies, the carriers, may desire to have the order of the Commission set aside. In other words, the time may come when the influences will be such as to make the Commission rather partial to the carrier than to the public. I do not know whether that question has been covered. If it has, I do not wish to trespass upon the Senator; but what I wish to ask him—and if he has already answered it I will not ask him now to take up the time to repeat it—is this: In case such an emergency should arise or it should so eventuate, is there any provision of law under which anyone interested in shipping over the railway lines could appeal to the courts to correct what might be deemed to be an injustice to the public under this bill?

Mr. FULTON. I think there is none. That is my understanding.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator if he does not think it is important for us to guard against that possibility by incorporating in this bill some provision by which the public may be allowed to bring in question the correctness of the ruling of the Commission?

Mr. FULTON. I would call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have been over that ground to some extent. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] made the same suggestion a short time ago.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon; I did not know that.

Mr. FULTON. And I said then that personally I had no objection to any such provision, but really I do not think it will be of any utility. In the first place, I do not believe that there is any probability that the public will ever have reason to complain that the rates made by the Commission would be higher than the railroads would have fixed them themselves; and, in the next place, this bill, as I understand, simply provides that when complaints shall be made and an existing rate is found to be too high, to be unreasonably high, they may fix a lower maximum rate. There is not any power given in this bill, as I understand, to increase the rates that are enforced by the railroads.

Mr. ALDRICH. No one has raised any such question. Neither the Senator from Georgia nor myself made any such suggestion.

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that there might possibly be a case where an appeal would be made to the Commission to correct an alleged injustice on the part of a railroad. The Commission might sustain the railroad, and the shipper might wish to test the question whether or not the Commission decided correctly when it sustained the rate the railroad had made.

Mr. FULTON. That is giving the shipper the right to review. I have said, and say again in answer to the Senator, that I myself have no objection to some such provision. It is possible that the time may arise and a case may be presented when the shipper will want to exercise that right. I have no objection to it, but I am not discussing the bill with reference to that theory.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator says he has himself no objection. Who is it, then, that has objection?

Mr. FULTON. I do not know of anyone.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not know of anyone who objects?

Mr. FULTON. I have not heard of anyone.

Mr. TELLER. Then I do not see why we need discuss it very extensively.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator will say in justice to me, that it was not I who brought the matter up.

Mr. TELLER. The suggestion that he himself did not have objection, seemed to me to indicate that he thought there was objection on the part of somebody that made it difficult for us to act.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator from Colorado is entirely too suspicious. I do not know of anyone.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, we have been several weeks discussing this bill, and really the only difference, it seems to me, between Senators is whether we shall allow a review of the proceedings of the Commission. We hear occasionally under certain circumstances that a review may be had. The Senator from Oregon now insists, as I understand his argument, that we do not need any special provision for review, as it is in this bill.

Mr. FULTON. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. For the carrier.

Mr. FULTON. I have not made any suggestion——

Mr. ALDRICH. The right is here for the carrier, but not for the shipper.

Mr. TELLER. I was speaking of the carriers.

Mr. FULTON. I say the right of review is in this bill to the carrier to the extent that is necessary to review the orders of the Commission to protect his constitutional right, because, in the first place, we can not deny him that right, and, in the next place, the bill does not pretend to deny him that right. If the bill sought to deny him that privilege, I would think, unquestionably, it would be unconstitutional; at least that provision would be unconstitutional. But the bill does not pretend to deny that right, and, therefore, it exists without any question.

Mr. TELLER. I should like the Senator to tell me as a lawyer what he means by "his constitutional right."

Mr. FULTON. I mean in this behalf the taking of property without just compensation, and possibly the taking of property without due process of law. I suppose those are the rights that might be brought in question in the matter of regulating rates of transportation lines. I do not know of any other constitutional provision that would be necessarily brought in question.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the Senator to say that he does not wish to have an entire review of the proceedings of the Commission?

Mr. FULTON. Yes. I do not.

Mr. TELLER. He wishes to limit it?

Mr. FULTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Whether that ought to be done would depend upon how the Senator might want to limit it. I do not know how much he wants to limit it.

Mr. FULTON. I thought I had explained the position I have taken on this question of review. I wish to restrict the right of review to those cases where it is necessary to protect the carrier against the taking of his property without just compensation under the rule that has been laid down by the Supreme Court.

Mr. MONEY rose.

Mr. FULTON. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. There are numerous cases where no possible question could arise about the taking of property. For instance, let me suggest this: We will suppose that a coal-mining company, having property in the immediate vicinity of the main line of a railroad, builds a side track, connects with the main line of the railroad, and asks that cars be supplied to it for its output, and the railroad company refuses to run cars into the mine or to supply it with cars, but at the same time it is supplying its competitor with those facilities. The mine owner is making no contention about the unreasonableness of the rate; he is demanding equal facilities and equal treatment. The Commission makes an order requiring the railroad company to supply him with those facilities. Would there be any possible question of the taking of property or the invasion of constitutional rights in the making of such an order as that, and would there be any reason why there should be an appeal from or a review of such an order as that? Why not make all orders of that character conclusive?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest that possibly the railroad might say they were not guilty of that conduct.

Mr. FULTON. If the railroad said it was not guilty of that conduct it would be furnishing cars, would it not?

Mr. TELLER. They might say they were unable to furnish them. They might find some excuse.

Mr. FULTON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that our courts have already established the rule in that regard; that where the railroads have not cars enough for all customers, it is their duty to make an equitable distribution of them.

Mr. TELLER. Suppose the carrier says they have made an equitable distribution? Suppose that is the issue they present; does the Senator say that can not be tried?

Mr. FULTON. Suppose the Commission says they have not. That is purely an administrative matter that the Commission is just as capable of determining as are the courts. It is not because I have any want of confidence in the courts; it is not because I question the integrity or the patriotism of the courts—there is no man who has a higher regard for the judiciary of this country than I have—but it is because it means delay and expense to the shipper that is unnecessary and unreasonable, and I insist that matters that are purely administrative shall be left to the Commission, and that their determination shall be final.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not the case which the Senator has just stated provided for by existing law? Does not the present law provide for mandamus in such cases?

Mr. FULTON. Probably. I am not questioning that. I simply use that as an illustration of one of the cases where it seems to me there is absolutely no necessity for a review; and yet in the rate bill proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and in some of the proposed amendments—I have not read them all—but in all that I have seen all orders made by the Commission are subject to review; and an order of the character to which I have just referred under that kind of an amendment would be subject to review.

Mr. SPOONER. If I understand the bill offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the right of review is limited entirely to a suit to test the lawfulness of an order which sets aside an existing rate and substitutes another rate for it.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FULTON. In a moment. The Senator from Wisconsin is mistaken in regard to the construction of the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania, or I am. We will see which one is. I read from the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania:

> SEC. 5. That the orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time as shall be prescribed by the Commission and shall continue for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the Commission, unless sooner set aside by the Commission or suspended or set aside by order of a court in a suit to test the lawfulness of said order; but any carrier, person, or corporation party to the proceeding affected by the decision of the Commission as to the rate or practice covered by the complaint, or by its order prescribing a different rate or practice, and alleging either or both to be a violation of its or his rights may institute proceedings, etc.

As to the "rate or practice." So it would cover just the character of case I have mentioned. Now, I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] asked a moment ago if such a condition of affairs as that described by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] was not already provided for by existing law. I want to ask the Senator, if that be true, how is it that the Interstate Commerce Commission, having examined the complaint of the Red Rock Fuel Company and granted it relief, so far as issuing an order was concerned, the railroad company snapped its fingers in the face of the order of the Commission, and we have not yet found any judge who has been able to give relief? Where is the existing law which grants relief for such a condition of affairs as that? Is it the failure of the judiciary to do their duty or is it in the failure of the law to provide a remedy? There is a screw loose somewhere.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question, if it will not disturb him.

Mr. FULTON. Not at all.

Mr. MONEY. I want to say that I am asking it for information.

Mr. FULTON. I should feel very proud if I thought I was able to give the Senator information.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator can on this point. The Senator's position, as I understand, is that it is unnecessary to provide in this bill for appeals to the courts, because there is such a constitutional right in every person; that under the clauses of the Constitution providing that private property shall not be taken without just compensation or due process of law, they have their appeal to the courts. I want to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, there is any difference in standing before the court in a matter of that sort between an individual proprietor, an individual citizen, and a corporation created by the State, one part of which is dedicated to making money for its stockholders, and the other to a public utility, clothed with the power of eminent domain for the benefit of the State, speaking of the people collectively as the State? Does the Senator conceive there is any difference on that point in their standing before the court?

Mr. FULTON. My answer to the Senator is that I can conceive of no difference in their standing before the court nor in their constitutional rights or in their right to invoke the protection that that provision of the Constitution guarantees to all citizens.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator does not consider that it is modified by the fact that the corporation is its creature, organized for a public utility?

Mr. FULTON. I do not. In other words, I do not think that you can take the property of a public-utility corporation for any less compensation or under any different rule of fixing just compensation than you can take the property of a private citizen. These corporations are only public corporations in the matter of the use of their property. Their property is private property just exactly the same as yours or mine.

Mr. MONEY. I simply wanted the Senator's opinion, not having formed one myself.

Now, if he will allow me, I will ask him another question on that point.

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Suppose there is no provision made in the bill as suggested by the Senator and outside of the constitutional rights, with respect to just compensation, and due process of law, would not the aggrieved party have a common-law remedy?

Mr. FULTON. That is, if there were no provision for a review?

Mr. MONEY. If there were nothing of that sort in the bill.

Mr. FULTON. That is the argument I have been attempting to make; that has been my contention throughout, that it is not necessary to prescribe a particular or any method of review; that the party has that right under the Constitution, so far as is necessary to protect his constitutional rights.

Mr. MONEY. I understood that to be the Senator's argument, but I wanted to ask him if a party did not have a common-law remedy, independent of his constitutional right.

Mr. FULTON. If I understand the Senator correctly, I will say "No," because I should say that if there was no provision in the Constitution which guaranteed the party against the taking of his property without due process of law, or, in other words, if there were no written Constitution against the taking of property without due process of law, without just compensation, I do not know of any remedy that a party would have if Congress should pass a law appropriating its property to a public use. It is possible that that principle which protects property and life is superior even to constitutions, and it is possible that the courts would say: "That is a principle which the courts will enforce without a constitutional limitation protecting the citizen." I am not certain about that, but I am very clear about this, that so far as the right of Congress to legislate is not restricted by any constitutional provision the provisions of the Congressional act can not be brought in question at the suit of anybody, and it is only when a party can bring himself under some constitutional provision, when he can appeal to some constitutional right, that he can question the validity of an enactment of the legislative body exercising its legislative power.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. If this bill should become a law in its present form, would a carrier have a right to insist that the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission should be just and reasonable?

Mr. FULTON. Would he have a right to insist that the rates should be just and reasonable?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. The law says that they shall be just and reasonable.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does that make them so?

Mr. FULTON. The presumption is they will be just and reasonable.

Mr. ALDRICH. Can that be questioned by the carrier?

Mr. FULTON. If the rates are unreasonable to the extent that it amounts to the taking of the property of the carrier without just compensation, yes; it has a remedy.

Mr. ALDRICH. But if the rates are not unreasonable to that extent, but still unreasonable, has it any remedy?

Mr. FULTON. If there is a line of demarcation, then it has none. I am not certain whether under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States there is any difference. I am not so certain that there is a broad ground between what is just and reasonable on the one side and that which is extortionate on the other side. I am confident that under the decisions of the Supreme Court what is meant by a just and reasonable rate is a rate that will give revenue not only sufficient to meet the expenses of operating the railroad or the transportation line, but which will give a sufficient return to give reasonable profit on the investment. I think that is the rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. I will in just a second. If that is the true rule, that a party is entitled to charge a rate that will give him a fair return on his investment, then the rate to be reasonable must allow that, and when you go beyond that, it seems to me, the rate becomes unjust and unreasonable. Still, it is contended by many, and I am not disputing it, that there is a wide field between the just and reasonable rate and the extortionate or unreasonable rate, which may be said to be the zone of discretion.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Oregon whether that rule would not amount to underwriting the stock and bonds of the common carrier to the extent of the guaranty of a given, fixed, definite income?

Mr. FULTON. The Supreme Court has explained that in several decisions.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will give me his attention for a moment——

Mr. FULTON. I will.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it is an important consideration. If, under the interpretation of the law as I understand the Senator to have stated it, the road may be assured a profit fixed, reasonable, and certain, I wish to inquire whether that does not amount to an underwriting of the stock and bonds of the transportation company upon the guaranty of the Government, and whether that is the kind of a law the Senator would have enacted?

Mr. FULTON. The Supreme Court has answered that question for the Senator, as he is doubtless aware. It has said that there may be cases where the corporation is not entitled to charge rates sufficiently high to pay dividends; there may be cases where the road has been built so extravagantly that its cost has been run up to an unreasonable amount. It may have unfortunately built it where there is very little business or not sufficient business to pay reasonable returns on the amount of the investment, or it may be operated extravagantly. In that sort of a case the carrier would not be entitled to make the profit that it would where it had the business which would justify a profit or where the road was economically conducted. But I am speaking of normal conditions. I am not speaking of exceptional or extraordinary conditions.

Now, take a railroad that is run under normal conditions, where it may earn a reasonable profit by charging reasonable rates, certainly the Commission should be empowered to restrict it to such rates, and the railroad should be required to conform to such rates.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator if that would not necessarily permit a railroad to charge any rate, within the rule of reasonableness, that might be necessary to make it a paying institution?

Mr. FULTON. No; not unless the conditions under which the railroad was operating justified it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I would ask whether those conditions might not be taken advantage of by a railroad company as a justification for charging any rate that would be equivalent to a profit, within the limits the Senator has mentioned, and would not that amount, as I repeat, to a guaranty of an income upon the cost of the railroad as represented by its stocks and debentures?

Mr. FULTON. Oh, I submit, with all respect to the Senator from Idaho, that he hardly submits a fair example. I think under the decisions of the Supreme Court the rule which the court will enforce is not difficult to understand. If a railroad is extravagantly managed, if unreasonable salaries are paid, and because of these unreasonable salaries the road can not charge reasonable rates and pay dividends, then it must suffer the consequences. It can lower the salaries if it sees fit, but it can not keep the salaries up to an unreasonable amount and charge unreasonable rates to meet them. In other words, the rule that will undoubtedly be enforced by the court is this: That a transportation company must be conducted along reasonably good business lines, under reasonably good management, and so conducted it is entitled to a reasonable return if the business of the company is such as will justify it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FULTON. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. The effect of what the Senator is saying is very important and very interesting. If I understand him, it is his idea that if we go into the rate-making business, as proposed in this legislation, it will be a part of the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to look at the conduct of the road generally in determining whether or not a fixed rate which has been challenged is reasonable; that it will go to the extent, in such a case, of considering the salaries paid to the officials who operate the railroad; I suppose the wages paid to employees, and I suppose the conduct of the road generally; and I state this, while I am on my feet, only suggestively, so that the Senator may answer it or not, whether it is necessary, as the officials of the road may have deemed it necessary, to expend the amounts of money they have been expending for the construction of new bridges, the elimination of curves, the reduction of grades, the enlargement of tunnels. The general conduct of the road; in a word, necessarily follows, does it not,

in order that the reasonableness of the rate may be intelligently determined?

I do not state this in an idle way, but in a serious way.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. FORAKER. I think so.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; I think the Commission, when it undertakes to prescribe rates, must take into consideration all the business, the environment, the character of the property, the necessity for renewals, extensions, and every matter that a business man would take into consideration in the management of it.

I have no doubt, speaking of a railroad "enjoying," if I may use the term, normal conditions, normal surroundings, that such would be the rule. But, of course, there can be extreme cases imagined where a railroad has been built through a nonproductive country or where it has been built at an extravagant cost and price. It can not, simply because of its misfortune in those respects, rob the people by outrageous prices in order to make the two ends meet. It must suffer the same consequences that a business man does in making a bad venture.

If it is conducting its business in a business way—in an economical way; if it is not paying unreasonable salaries, and is receiving a reasonable income, to which it may justly look for a reward and a just return on its investment, the Commission should, and the court will insist that the Commission shall, allow it to have such rates as will give it a reasonable return and a reasonable reward under those conditions. But that is all it is entitled to.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. FULTON. I am anxious to close. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment, if he wishes me to. I was approaching this proposition: The fact that the courts have established so liberal a rule as to what constitutes a taking of private property for public use and what constitutes just compensation for the taking of private property for public use, is one reason why I have been willing to restrict this inquiry by the courts to the mere question as to whether or not the constitutional rights of the carrier have been invaded.

Had the court announced a less generous rule, had it said that the just compensation to which the railroads are entitled is merely enough of receipts to pay the cost of operation and of keeping up its property, I would not consent to limit this right of review to constitutional questions. But since the court has made a liberal rule and has said that the carriers are not only entitled to that but are entitled to a reasonable return on their property when managed in a reasonably good business manner, I think that is a safe enough rule for them, and we can safely, reasonably, and justly restrict them to a rule that will simply protect the constitutional rights as declared by the Supreme Court to be.

Now I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the contention of the Senator from Oregon, it is this: That under an effort made by a carrier to assert its constitutional rights, the question of the justness and reasonableness of the rates must be inquired into and inquired into upon the basis now suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FULTON. Of course. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. Allow me to answer the Senator from Rhode Island.

I have no doubt about this. Should a corporation present a bill in equity, alleging that certain rates prescribed by the Commission amount to a confiscation of its property to this extent, that it deprives it of earning a sufficient return to meet its expenses and pay any profit, or a fair profit, the court will inquire into that rate and ascertain and determine whether or not the contention is true; and if that contention be found to be true, I have no doubt the court would enjoin the rate. Now I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Only a question, to get at the Senator's ideas. Of course, it is not an appeal from the order of the Commission, because it is an administrative, a nonjudicial body. But it is an original bill filed in the circuit court of the United States.

I want to ask the Senator what he means by restricting the judicial power of the United States in such cases; whether he thinks the Congress can by any legislation exclude from the consideration of the court in such a case any right under the Constitution and laws of the United States which the complainant alleges and establishes has been invaded?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FULTON. I should first like to answer the Senator from Wisconsin, unless the Senator from Minnesota desires to answer him.

Mr. NELSON. I want to answer the question.

Mr. FULTON. Very well; I will allow the Senator to answer it, and then I will answer it.

Mr. NELSON. The Constitution of the United States committed to Congress, and not the courts, the power to regulate commerce. If that power is given to Congress, why should we delegate any part of that power to the courts? The only power reserved to the courts is simply to see that we have not exceeded our constitutional powers—in other words, violated the fifth amendment. If you undertake to cover the right of appeal or review further than that, you withhold a part of the power that is given to Congress by the Federal Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Minnesota does not answer my question.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me, I understood his question to be this: Can Congress deprive the court of the right to inquire into a carrier's complaint, exhibited in a bill in equity, charging that an order of the Commission in any respect invades its constitutional rights?

Mr. SPOONER. Rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. FULTON. "Under the Constitution and laws of the United States" suggests two propositions. Under the Constitution of the United States is one proposition, and under the laws of the United States is another proposition. I say you could not deprive the courts of the power to inquire into the constitutional question, but that any right which a party has under the laws of the United States must be a right that is given to him by the laws of the United States, and may be regulated and the remedy restricted or denied as Congress sees fit.

Mr. SPOONER. What I ask the Senator is this: Is it competent for Congress to prevent a citizen of the United States, in any case in which the United States courts have cognizance, from filing a bill to protect him in the enjoyment of any right secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States?

Mr. FULTON. No. I will answer the question of the Senator by saying, no—if he has the right; but Congress can say whether or not he shall have a right to appeal to the courts to enforce a right given to him by Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but the right which I understand he is appealing to the court to protect is not a right given to him by Congress, or a right that can be taken away from him by Congress.

Mr. FULTON. What is the right?

Mr. SPOONER. It is a right which exists under the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FULTON. Very well. Have I not said that?

Mr. SPOONER. I know; but what does the Senator and others mean by using in that connection the words "restricting the right of review?"

Mr. FULTON. I tried to instance——

Mr. SPOONER. It is not a review. It is not an appeal. It is an original bill to secure a right under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. FULTON. Very true.

Mr. SPOONER. If no right exists under the laws of the United States, that is one thing; but if the right exists under the Constitution or under the laws of the United States, is it possible to restrict the judicial power as to that right?

Mr. FULTON. No; if the right exists.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course.

Mr. FULTON. It is very true that this proceeding, as the Senator says, is an original proceeding. It is not an appeal. In one sense you may say it is not a review, but we call it review. It is a convenient term, and we all know what we mean when we speak of the "right of review."

I answer the Senator by saying no. Speaking broadly, if the party has a right under the Constitution or laws of the United States, we can not prevent the courts of the United States from taking jurisdiction to enforce his right, but we can say whether or not he has a right to litigate in the courts a certain question which arises under a law of Congress. Aliens have a right to land in this country.

Mr. ALDRICH. They have no such right.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. FULTON. They have a right——

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. FULTON. Certain aliens have a right to land in this country under the laws of Congress, but Congress restricts the right.

Mr. SPOONER. Whether an alien can land in this country——

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will kindly wait a moment, the Supreme Court has held, in the interpretation of the Chinese-exclusion act, as the Senator is well aware, that under the law of Congress which excludes Chinese from coming into this country Congress may clothe a purely administrative body with the right to determine whether or not a man is a citizen; whether or not he is a Chinaman, and if the board says he is a Chinaman, it can exclude him. And it was, I confess, to my utter amazement and astonishment that the court in one case held that even if the party demanding admission contended that he was a citizen of the United States he could not appeal to the courts under the writ of habeas corpus act and have that question litigated, but that he was bound by the ruling of an administrative officer. In that case the applicant for the writ of habeas corpus claimed to be a native-born citizen of this country. I do not believe, I will say, with all due regard and the highest regard for the Supreme Court, that particular decision is good law.

But there are cases of that character where Congress creates the right in a party—and I only cite that as an extreme case for the purpose of illustration—where Congress has the power to restrict the right and determine to what extent, if any, the party is entitled to a judicial trial or investigation.

Now, then, Congress or State governments create these corporations; give them the right of eminent domain; give them the right to collect charges; give them the right to make rates; give them the right to engage in interstate commerce. There are certain things that Congress may regulate and limit in the execution or enjoyment of the rights it has given those corporations to employ in interstate commerce. It may not take their property from them without just compensation; it may not deprive them of their property without due process of law. But there are matters which it has given them the right to do—to build railroad tracks, sidings, to connect with other public utilities, factories, shippers—and Congress may say to what extent they shall be subjected in the exercise of such rights to the control of a commission appointed and created by Congress, and whether or not the determination of the Commission shall be final and conclusive.

Take the instance I suggested a while ago——

Mr. SPOONER. You do not mean that?

Mr. FULTON. Yes; I do.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator does not mean to say, of course, that Congress can commit to an administrative body the power to fix a reasonable rate and to make that finding conclusive.

Mr. FULTON. No; I did not say "rate."

Mr. SPOONER. That is what we are talking about—rates.

Mr. FULTON. But I did not use the word "rate." I said there were many administrative matters such as the matter of sidetracks, building bridges, etc., which a corporation could not exercise at all did we not give them the right to exercise them. The corporation could not build a mile of railroad if it were not authorized by the Government to do it. The Government authorizes it to build switches to connect with shippers. It can only do that by the grace and authority of the Government. When it does it by the grace and authority of the Government, that is one of the rights which the Government can absolutely restrict and prevent it going into court to litigate. It can attach that condition to the exercise of the right. It can create an administrative board. It can commit to that administrative board the power to pass on questions of that character, and it is "due process of law" in such cases.

Now, the Senator will not contend, I am sure, that due process of law means judicial investigation in all cases. Due process of law in many instances is satisfied when an administrative board or body has inquired into and determined the matter. The Senator will not dispute that, I submit.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will direct his attention to another phase of this power that is not reviewable. It is in the Post-Office Department. The Postmaster-General is authorized by act of Congress to take into consideration whether the mails are used by any person with a view to defraud, and then, by issuing a fraud order, which may or may not be based upon a just conclusion and a true statement of the facts, property may be destroyed or rights taken, and there is absolutely no appeal to the courts, and the citizen can not get into the courts in those cases.

I have had complaint after complaint come to me, pointing out wherein fraud orders have been issued against certain parties and their property destroyed and they have tried to get into court to test the matter to see whether they were being robbed or imposed on and they can not get in at all. Why? The Congress did not permit it.

Mr. FULTON. There is something in what the Senator argues on that proposition. The right to enjoy the facilities of the mail is not a natural right, but a right granted by Congress, and of course Congress can restrict a right to investigate or review its orders in that regard. There is very much in what the Senator from South Carolina says.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FULTON. I shall be very glad to have the Senator ask me a question.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has made a very thoughtful and able speech. We all want to get at the right of this matter. I wanted to bring the Senator back for a moment to one point. I agree with what he has been saying in answer to the Senator from South Carolina, although the court distinguishes the post-office matter as being entirely different from the question which we are discussing.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is very unfortunate for me that whenever I get the Senator from Wisconsin up against a proposition of constitutionality he begins to say the court distinguishes between my contention and his own.

Mr. SPOONER. It may be unfortunate for the court from the Senator's standpoint, but I will undertake to satisfy even the Senator, and that is easy——

Mr. TILLMAN. I am always reasonable, I hope.

Mr. SPOONER. That the Supreme Court of the United States has distinguished between the exercise of the power to which he refers in post-office cases and the power of taxation and the exercise of the power of eminent domain and the question we are discussing and considering here. I have not the decision here, but I am perfectly familiar with them, and the Senator is not. I will bring them to his attention, and if he has any complaint to make it is with the Supreme Court and not with me.

I want to bring the Senator from Oregon back to this question if he will, for a moment, to see what he means by a restricted review. He concedes—he must concede—that while in cases like the Chinese case, and other cases which are referred to by the court, there may be committed to an administrative body, executive officials, the determination of questions of fact and their conclusion may be final, it is not true that the fixing of rates by this Commission can not be made final or conclusive.

Mr. FULTON. I agree to that.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator agrees to that, of course. The carrier may go into court and complain that the rate is such as to deprive him under the Constitution of the just compensation which that instrument secures to him.

Now, I want to ask the Senator if, the amount being sufficient, it is competent for Congress to deprive any citizen of the right to assert, or of the court to determine or adjudicate upon the right, which he claims under the Constitution or laws of the United States is invaded? The judicial power extends to rights arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Where does this power to restrict come in the case we are talking about here? It can not fall short of just compensation, the Senator will admit, which Mr. Justice Brewer says is the full and fair equivalent, and must be the full and fair equivalent. Beyond that, what can there be, unless it be that the Commission exceeds its power in some way? If the Commission exceeds its power under the law which creates it and which governs it, the Senator will admit that that is a subject of adjudication——

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. By the court, and that power can not be taken away from the court. Now, where do we differ?

Mr. FULTON. I hope that we do not differ. I hope the Senator takes the same view I do. I suggested in the early part of the discussion, and I was quite sure he would——

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator mean, then, by restricting the party in this question?

Mr. FULTON. I mean, as I have endeavored to explain several times, that I would restrict the party or the court on a suit instituted for the purpose of inquiring into the legality of an order of the Commission to an inquiry as to whether the enforcement of the order would amount to a taking of the property without just compensation. The burden of proof would necessarily be on the party asserting that it did amount to that; and if he failed to show that it did amount to a taking of property without just compensation, the meaning of which the court has so frequently described, the court could not inquire further. The court could not go on and substitute its discretion for that of the Commission. I would not have the court authorized to go into the inquiry that far.

in order that the reasonableness of the rate may be intelligently determined?

I do not state this in an idle way, but in a serious way.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. FORAKER. I think so.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; I think the Commission, when it undertakes to prescribe rates, must take into consideration all the business, the environment, the character of the property, the necessity for renewals, extensions, and every matter that a business man would take into consideration in the management of it.

I have no doubt, speaking of a railroad "enjoying," if I may use the term, normal conditions, normal surroundings, that such would be the rule. But, of course, there can be extreme cases imagined where a railroad has been built through a nonproductive country or where it has been built at an extravagant cost and price. It can not, simply because of its misfortune in those respects, rob the people by outrageous prices in order to make the two ends meet. It must suffer the same consequences that a business man does in making a bad venture.

If it is conducting its business in a business way—in an economical way; if it is not paying unreasonable salaries, and is receiving a reasonable income, to which it may justly look for a reward and a just return on its investment, the Commission should, and the court will insist that the Commission shall, allow it to have such rates as will give it a reasonable return and a reasonable reward under those conditions. But that is all it is entitled to.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. FULTON. I am anxious to close. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment, if he wishes me to. I was approaching this proposition: The fact that the courts have established so liberal a rule as to what constitutes a taking of private property for public use and what constitutes just compensation for the taking of private property for public use, is one reason why I have been willing to restrict this inquiry by the courts to the mere question as to whether or not the constitutional rights of the carrier have been invaded.

Had the court announced a less generous rule, had it said that the just compensation to which the railroads are entitled is merely enough of receipts to pay the cost of operation and of keeping up its property, I would not consent to limit this right of review to constitutional questions. But since the court has made a liberal rule and has said that the carriers are not only entitled to that but are entitled to a reasonable return on their property when managed in a reasonably good business manner, I think that is a safe enough rule for them, and we can safely, reasonably, and justly restrict them to a rule that will simply protect the constitutional rights as declared by the Supreme Court to be.

Now I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the contention of the Senator from Oregon, it is this: That under an effort made by a carrier to assert its constitutional rights, the question of the justness and reasonableness of the rates must be inquired into and inquired into upon the basis now suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FULTON. Of course. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. Allow me to answer the Senator from Rhode Island.

I have no doubt about this. Should a corporation present a bill in equity, alleging that certain rates prescribed by the Commission amount to a confiscation of its property to this extent, that it deprives it of earning a sufficient return to meet its expenses and pay any profit, or a fair profit, the court will inquire into that rate and ascertain and determine whether or not the contention is true; and if that contention be found to be true, I have no doubt the court would enjoin the rate. Now I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. Only a question, to get at the Senator's ideas. Of course, it is not an appeal from the order of the Commission, because it is an administrative, a nonjudicial body. But it is an original bill filed in the circuit court of the United States.

I want to ask the Senator what he means by restricting the judicial power of the United States in such cases; whether he thinks the Congress can by any legislation exclude from the consideration of the court in such a case any right under the Constitution and laws of the United States which the complainant alleges and establishes has been invaded?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FULTON. I should first like to answer the Senator from Wisconsin, unless the Senator from Minnesota desires to answer him.

Mr. NELSON. I want to answer the question.

Mr. FULTON. Very well; I will allow the Senator to answer it, and then I will answer it.

Mr. NELSON. The Constitution of the United States committed to Congress, and not the courts, the power to regulate commerce. Mr. SPOONER. Rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. FULTON. "Under the Constitution and laws of the United States" suggests two propositions. Under the Constitution of the United States is one proposition, and under the laws of the United States is another proposition. I say you could not deprive the courts of the power to inquire into the constitutional question, but that any right which a party has under the laws of the United States must be a right that is given to him by the laws of the United States, and may be regulated and the remedy restricted or denied as Congress sees fit.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but the right which I understand he is appealing to the court to protect is not a right given to him by Congress, or a right that can be taken away from him by Congress.

Mr. FULTON. What is the right?

Mr. SPOONER. It is a right which exists under the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FULTON. Very well. Have I not said that?

Mr. SPOONER. I know; but what does the Senator and others mean by using in that connection the words "restricting the right of review?"

The court could not go on and substitute its discretion for that of the Commission. I would not have the court authorized to go into the inquiry that far.

Mr. SPOONER. Could we confer that power?

Mr. FULTON. I suppose we could provide for a trial, de novo, if we wished to. We authorize the Commission to fix reasonable rates. We say that a reasonable rate must be such a one as will afford just compensation. I do not know how much ground there is between the line marking reasonable compensation and the line where the rate becomes exorbitant. Is there a broad space between the two lines within which discretion may be exercised? I do not know. I am not sure about that. It is contended by many that there is. But I am very sure that if we restrict the judicial inquiry to inquiring as to whether or not the rate that has been fixed by the Commission is unreasonable to the extent that it deprives the carrier of a just return on his property, we will not do him an injustice.

Mr. HEYBURN rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator, because of a remark which he has just made, whether he believes Congress can restrict the judicial power at all. The Senator speaks of limiting the judicial power.

Mr. FULTON. I do not think that I have spoken of limiting the judicial power. If so, I have done it unintentionally.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not know whether the Senator used it intentionally or not. He spoke of restricting the judicial power.

Mr. FULTON. The power of the court, under this act, to inquire into the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a rate may be a part of the judicial power, but it is not restricting the judicial power when I say that the inquiry of the court shall be confined to a case involving the question of the constitutionality of the rate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know where the line is to be drawn after the court has jurisdiction of a question as to the measure of its power. Does the Senator think, the court having jurisdiction of a question, Congress can say how far it shall exercise its judicial power?

Mr. FULTON. I do not think that question arises here.

Mr. HEYBURN. It seems to me that it does upon the consideration of the very proposition just submitted by the Senator. I should like to have the Senator's attention for a moment.

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The distinction which governs that was clearly drawn in the Constitutional Convention by Mr. Madison. When the Constitution was originally reported from the Revision Committee what is now section 2 of Article III was section 3 of Article XI, and it thus remained for consideration before the Constitutional Convention about three weeks. The language used in the beginning of section 3 of Article XI was "the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court" shall attach to the various subjects that are now comprised in section 2 of Article III of the Constitution. On the motion of Mr. Madison, seconded by Gouverneur Morris, the language of that section was changed so that instead of reading "the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States shall apply" it was made to read as it reads now, for the purpose of obviating the very suggestion contained in the Senator's remarks—that the same degree of power should be conferred as to the class of actions enumerated in section 2 of Article III, which was then section 3 of Article XI, as was conferred by section 1 of Article III, showing that the Constitutional Convention had in its mind to draw clearly the distinction between jurisdiction and power. And the courts——

Mr. FULTON. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I wish to conclude my remarks.

Mr. HEYBURN. Allow me to finish my sentence. The courts having retained jurisdiction, I inquire whether the Senator thinks the jurisdiction of the court, having attached to these subjects-matter or the litigation, an act of Congress can say how far that power shall be exercised?

Mr. FULTON. I agree with the Senator, if that is his contention, that if we give the court jurisdiction of a particular subject, we can not regulate or say what character of judgment the court shall enter. I admit that there is a vast difference between judicial power and jurisdiction, and I admit that the judicial power which is conferred by the Constitution can not be restricted by legislation, nor can its exercise be restricted. But we may say whether or not the court may take jurisdiction of a certain case. Granting it jurisdiction of the case, however, we may not restrict its judicial power. It seems to me that there may be a broad space between a reasonable and an unreasonably high rate, and within that zone the fixing of a reasonable rate is a matter of discretion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like right there——

Mr. FULTON. When you get beyond the line where it is simply a reasonable rate, to the extent that it affords a just compensation to the carrier, there is a broad field for the exercise of discretion—purely discretion. I would not give the court power to go into that and substitute its discretion for the discretion of the Commission. I would not grant it jurisdiction in such a case. That is different from granting it jurisdiction and then attempting to limit its judicial power.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, if the Senator will permit me, he admits that we can not control the ultimate decision. Can it be possible, then, that Congress can prescribe a rule by which that decision or conclusion is to be reached? Inasmuch as this proceeding is in equity, can we say by what process or to what extent the mind of the chancellor shall be subjected in order that it may be convinced of the right of a cause? Can we place any limitation upon the mental process or can we prescribe the limit beyond which the mind of the chancellor shall not go?

Mr. FULTON. No; the Senator is very correct about that. There is no dispute between us on that proposition. But we do not give the court jurisdiction of the case. We do not give the court jurisdiction of any case under this bill; but under the Constitution the court has the right to take jurisdiction of a case to preserve the constitutional rights of the citizen, to inquire whether his property is being taken without just compensation. The inquiry of the court is limited to that. That is the case before the court.

Now, how far the court will go in saying what is a reasonably compensatory rate is for the court to say. We can not by law say that the court shall say this or that is a reasonably compensatory rate. If we could, we could make a rate fixed by the Commission conclusive. We could do the one just as well as the other. That is a matter which rests in the sound discretion of the court. But we can establish the broad proposition that the rates shall remain as the Commission fixed them unless they violate the constitutional rights of the party to the extent that they amount to a taking without just compensation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will ask, Can we say that?

Mr. FULTON. As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggests to me, we do not have to say that. If we say nothing, as I propose this bill shall, and as it does at the present time, that is all the court can do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. I will yield for a question, but I will say to the Senator, with all kindness, that I am very tired, and I rather suspect the Senate is, too. I should like to finish.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think the Senate is at all weary of the very excellent argument the Senator has been making. I will not prolong the Senator's time.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator wants to ask a question, I will yield to him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say what I have to say in my own time. It was rather a commentary upon the Senator's remarks than a question.

Mr. FULTON. Then, Mr. President, I will conclude the statement that I started in to make some time ago. In view of the very liberal rule which the court has made as to what constitutes just compensation, it does not seem to me that we are fixing a rule that will work a hardship on the carriers when we say that so far as the right of review is concerned it shall be limited to that. I thank the Senate for the consideration shown me, and I yield the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 5, after the word "prescribed," strike out all of said line down to and including the word "jurisdiction," at the end of line 9. On page 14 strike out all of line 18 down to and including the word "effect," in line 2, page 15, and in lieu of the words stricken out on page 14 insert the following:

That all orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time as shall be prescribed by the Commission, and shall continue for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the Commission, unless sooner set aside by the Commission or suspended or set aside in a suit brought against the Commission in the circuit court of the United States, sitting as a court of equity for the district wherein any carrier plaintiff in said suit has its principal operating office, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit courts of the United States to hear and determine in any such suit whether the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate, to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall speak upon the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it had not been my intention to make any remarks upon the pending bill to-day, but in view of the conditions that have arisen I will ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes. I will call attention to some features of the bill which seem to me absolutely essential to be considered and determined before we can intelligently meet the expectations of the people by this legislation.

The bill does not provide any remedy by review on the part of the real party in interest, the producer and the shipper. It is the interest of the producer and shipper that we are supposed to be trying to protect in this legislation, and yet there is not one word or declaration in the bill that gives either the right to appeal from the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission under any circumstances. Thousands of complaints have been filed with the Commission since its creation that have been adversely determined or not determined at all. The shippers have stood mute and silent because the law afforded them no remedy except the expensive common-law remedy of going into a court to recover damages at their own expense from the corporation at whose hands they were wronged.

Can it be possible that any effective or sufficient legislation upon this question of regulation of freight rates in the interest of the producer and shipper can thus ignore them, place them absolutely at the mercy of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and give them the right to appeal neither from the decision of that Commission nor to the courts? Can it be possible that such a class of legislation will meet with the expectations of the people or that it will cover their necessities? I do not think so, and I think before this question leaves this body we will have found it necessary to give the producer and shipper their day in court, too. Where, under the provisions of this legislation as proposed by any measure before this body, is the producer or shipper given his day in court, except the vicarious provision that he may through the guardianship of the Interstate Commerce Commission, if in the wisdom of the guardian he has been wronged, have his rights reviewed?

I commend that to the consideration of those who have framed and presented this measure to the Senate as one that they will have to answer to the people for when in their hour of disappointment they shall realize that they have simply had a guardian appointed for them.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. I quite agree with the Senator from Idaho in his observations, so far as they extend to the bill under consideration; but he asks where in this bill or in any other bill which has been proposed is there a provision for protecting the right of the shipper and giving him his day in court? If the Senator will do me the honor to read the bill I proposed, he will find that that provision is specifically in that bill, and that from any order the Commission may make the shipper or any other party to the proceeding may carry the case into court.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I did not intend that my remark should be so comprehensive as it seems to have been. I was referring more particularly to the measures that had been presented to the Senate by the committee having charge of the pending bill. I will, in justice to the Senator from Pennsylvania, say that the provisions of the amendment suggested or introduced by the Senator go much further in the right direction than do any of the provisions of the bills that have come from the Interstate Commerce Committee of this body. Now, I would not under any circumstances be guilty of disrespect or of a slighting remark with reference to that committee. Through many long months it labored conscientiously with this question in its endeavor to solve it and present a bill that would cover the necessities of the people; and it did bring in here doubtless a more comprehensive bill, something that more nearly approaches a protection of the rights of the shipper than anything that had been presented to the Senate before. But the committee, unfortunately, did not entirely agree among its own members as to what was necessary to meet the emergencies of this situation; and, Mr. President, it is now out of the hands of that committee. This bill is before the greatest legislative committee in the world—the Committee of the Whole of the United States Senate. Every member of this body is a member of that Committee of the Whole. We are here to consider this bill as a matter of first intention; and, if we can, to gather up out of all that is before us that measure of wisdom that will meet the requirements in reference to rate legislation.

Mr. President, it is just as necessary that the producer and shipper should have their day in court and that their constitutional rights should be observed as it is that the carrier should have his day in court.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understand the Senator to say that the shipper ought to have the right to have the order of the Commission fixing the maximum rate reviewed in the courts. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Would the Senator be kind enough to state what remedy the courts could give the shipper in such a case? If I understand it, the jurisdiction of the court is very simple in such a case. It has the jurisdiction to affirm the order and it has the jurisdiction to vacate it. If the order is affirmed, the shipper is just where he was; if the order is vacated, the shipper is thrown back upon the original railroad rate and regulation. I should like to understand upon what theory the Senator expects the shipper to cast his fortunes in a litigation of that sort?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the decision of the Commission is affirmed, it is true the shipper is just where he was. He is under the guardianship of the Commission. If the Commission has erred and the court sustains the contention of the transportation company and turns down the contention of the shipper, the shipper is just exactly where he was, suffering under the wrongs of which he complains.

Here is the vice contained in this bill. It is on page 39 of the reprint. I will read it. After providing that the party may bring his suit in his own name and on his own responsibility to recover damages, etc., it says:

> But such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies, and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt.

That is to say, when a person has complained to the Interstate Commerce Commission, of course he is taking the chances on their determination of the matter. He is compelled by the provisions of the bill to elect, in an hour when he can not exercise any discriminating judgment as to what would result best for him, whether he will abide by the decision of this Commission, which is a mere arbitrator, or whether he will preserve to himself his constitutional rights to maintain an action in his own name. While I have my doubts about the court sustaining an objection to his proceeding in a case, notwithstanding the fact that he had placed his case in the hands of the Commission, yet we are to take this bill upon its face, and if he has once submitted his case to the Interstate Commerce Commission, according to the terms of this bill, he is precluded from exercising his constitutional right to test the reasonableness or the justness or the legality of the rate from which he has appealed or the conditions to which he has objected.

I ask again, Where and when does the producer or shipper have his day in court, when the bill by its own terms provides that, having taken advantage of this measure, he may not again appeal to the court under the constitutional right which is inherent in him?

I merely intend to-day to suggest these objections. They will have to be answered in the minds of Senators before they cast their last vote upon this question; and before this bill leaves this body we shall be compelled to take up the producers' and shippers' side of it. The producers, the shipper, and the consumer are the parties whose interests are very closely woven together in this matter, and the bill has not been discussed from the standpoint of either the consumer of the commodity or the shipper of it, who generally is the producer of it or the factor of it. All of the energy and intelligence of this body has been directed rather to how and to what extent we could deal with the rights of the transportation company.

The transportation company is not necessarily the enemy of the producer of commodity or the factor of commodity or the shipper of commodity. It is presumed that in the majority of cases the law of contract would be sufficient, but this proposed law is dealing only with those cases where the law of contract is not sufficient, because, if the law of contract were sufficient, there would be no complaint filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I commend these thoughts to Senators, that they may deal with them, because the people are going to inquire, "Well, what have you done for us?" They are going to say, "We were not asking you to punish in a punitive way the transportation companies of the land; they are not our enemies; we only ask you to adjust the rights between us, and to provide a remedy for their enforcement."

The Constitution of the United States has provided the courts, it has given them judicial power, and we can not take it from them; we can not change the processes of their action; we can not prescribe a rule by which the mind of the chancellor shall be convinced; we can not limit the scope of inquiry that the chancellor demands in order that he may conscientiously deliver his decree.

Much of this discussion—and I say in all respect to Senators—seems to me to have been directed to this, perhaps I might term it misconception of the distinction that was made, and made deliberately, in the framing of the Constitution of the United States, between judicial power and jurisdiction. One begins after the other has performed its duty. The power is given by the Constitution; the jurisdiction is apportioned and divided by Congress, subject to the limitations of the Constitution.

The Constitution, in order that there might be no uncertainty in a certain line of cases or under certain conditions, prescribes not only the power, but the jurisdiction, and in the second section of Article III of the Constitution the power is given to the courts to deal with certain questions. That did not mean to deal with them at the whim and caprice of changing fancy or of changing Congresses. It meant that it should be a substantial right that should be the same yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow. We apportion the jurisdiction between the courts where the Constitution has not done it, and only in those cases; but we do not limit or apportion the power of the court.

The court of equity, as was said by Lord Eldon in a celebrated case, having once the power to determine a question, regulates its own jurisdiction so far as the method of exercising that power is concerned, and it has been said, in reviewing that case, by more than one eminent jurist of this country, that the rule stated by Lord Eldon in that decision—I believe it was in 11 Vesey—ran all through the jurisdiction of the courts of equity of the United States in dealing with its functions; that it was not subject to be changed or modified by the legislature of either the States or of the United States; that the power being in the court, it being a coordinate branch of the Government, the manner of the exercise of that power was for the court, and not for the legislature. We enact a law. It is for the court to say whether or not that law is in conformity with the Constitution of the United States—that great sailing chart of the ship of state, which, perhaps, is the best drawn legal document of which there is any record in the history of this or any other country.

Mr. President, I do not intend to elaborate to any great extent upon this idea. I merely want to set it abroad. I made a suggestion while the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] was speaking, which has some force, which I desire to commend to the consideration of Senators. If we are to declare a rule here, or if we are to assume that the decision of the courts has established a rule that every transportation company in this country is entitled to earn, and to be guaranteed and protected in earning, a given percentage upon its investment on the value of its property, it amounts, as I said before, to underwriting the stocks and bonds of that railroad company. If we take the value of the stocks and bonds of a railroad company as the basis upon which to estimate the earnings that that railroad is entitled to make, and we say to the world that we thereby authorize this railroad or transportation company to make such charges for its services as will yield it 6 per cent upon its investment, what have we done? We have created a class of investments, whether it be the stocks or bonds of these railroads, that are better and worth more than the bonds of the Government or any of the municipalities within the Government. We say to investors, "The Government is behind you; we will protect you and guarantee you the right to earn 6 per cent upon these stocks or bonds," have we not? Do we intend to do it? I think not. I think if we should do anything that could be so construed, we would be called to account for it by the people upon the very first occasion when they had the opportunity to do so.

I desire to call attention to but one more question to-day. It is an important question, and is another question that has to be solved. It is one that was suggested to me by the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with reference to the disposition of the funds deposited in court during the review of the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I want to inquire as to the manner of the disposal of that fund, because it will in some cases amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars. I have an item of shipment of stock from the State of Idaho alone, some 8,000 cars during the last stock-shipping season, which would amount to more than a million dollars in freights; and a difference of 3 per cent between what the shipper thought was a fair rate and what the railroad company claimed was a fair rate would amount to no ordinary fortune. That money is provided to be deposited in the court or to be represented by a bond that is equivalent to the cash.

Before the question is settled as to who was right in that controversy, as to whether the shipper was right or the railroad company was right, months have elapsed; that money has been idly resting in the security of the court, whether in the form of cash or bonds. The court decides, for example, that the shipper was right in the controversy, and that money goes back to the shipper; but the shipper has disposed of his stock in the cattle yards along the Mississippi Valley. He has placed a price upon that stock based upon the possibility of his never receiving back the money that is in court, based upon the possibility of his losing it, because he would be an unwise man to take any chances. Now, he has received a price for his commodity commensurate with the value based upon the freight that was demanded of him and which he paid into court. When the money is paid out by the court, to whom does it go? To the shipper? He has already received it; he has taken it into consideration in disposing of his commodity. To the railroad company? They have been adjudged not entitled to it. To whom does it belong? It belongs to the people who bought that meat from the cutter's block and who consumed it in their homes. They are the ones who paid the increased price. They paid for it on the basis of the maximum freight demanded by the railroad company.

Senators, we have to solve these questions before we can dispose of this bill. There are a good many questions yet to be solved in legislating upon this subject, many of which have not yet been broached; and on this occasion, as I say, I only desire to call attention to them. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] met me on one occasion by asking, "Why do you not offer amendments?" It is not yet necessary to offer these amendments. The discussion of this matter in Committee of the Whole, as we are now considering it, means that we are trying to sift our minds down to the ultimate conclusion that will justify a man in crystallizing his conclusions in the shape of amendments, and we are not called upon to put them in the form of amendments, and send them now to the Secretary's desk only, perhaps, to be criticised by ourselves afterwards. We are here for an intelligent interchange of ideas upon this subject; and it may be true, and doubtless it is, that the suggestions I have thown out are subject to criticism, and that by the time we have discussed this measure backward and forward, we shall all of us have arrived at modified conclusions, even upon the questions about which we have felt most certain. It is not enough to dispose of the legal questions; they must be disposed of, and disposed of with exactness and accuracy; but after we have disposed of them, we must apply them to the necessities of this class of legislation, and see to it that when the bill finally becomes a law, if we shall agree upon one—and I sincerely trust we shall—it will not only stand the scrutiny of the Supreme Court of the United States, but it will stand the scrutiny and meet the approval of the people in whose interest we are legislating.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I propose to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments to consider the argument that this bill is unconstitutional, because it does not contain in express terms an express provision for review.

I listened with rapt attention to the exceedingly able speech of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] on the pending railway rate bill. I have since that time read his speech in cold type, and I have pondered much over his argument that the bill is unconstitutional because the right of judicial review is not conferred in express terms. While it may seem ungracious and presumptuous for me, a plebian lawyer from the far Northwest, to differ on this point with such an able lawyer as the Senator from Pennsylvania, yet I can not forbear, in this forum of free and full discussion where, at least in a technical sense, we are all on a footing of equality, to express my dissent from the conclusions of the Senator and to briefly express the grounds and reasons for such dissent.

First. There is in the bill no direct or express bar to the right of judicial review, as there was in the case of the Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418), cited by the Senator, but on the contrary, both expressly and by necessary implication, the right of judicial review within constitutional limits exists. Hence the Minnesota case can have no application. The following language in the bill clearly implies that a judicial review is not barred, but rather contemplated and invited. I quote: "Or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction," line 9, page 11, and by the language as to venue, etc., found on page 17:

The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office. The provisions of "An act to expedite the hearing and determination of suits in equity, and so forth," approved February 11, 1903, shall be, and are hereby, made applicable to all such suits, and are also made applicable to any proceeding in equity to enforce any order or requirement of the Commission, or any of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

Second. There are three modes in which a judicial review can be had under the bill: (1) Under the general right conferred by the judiciary act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat., 552), as open to railways, if their rights are invaded, as to other litigants. The Commission is not a necessary party, nor the only one that could be made a party adverse to the railway company in such a proceeding. The party making the complaint to the Commission, or any other party seeking to enforce the order, would be a proper party to the proceeding. Besides, any shipper whose goods the railway would refuse to carry at the Commission rate would have a right of action, and the railway could easily raise such an issue. In either case the constitutional validity of the Commission rate would be subject to judicial review. (2) In a proceeding to enforce the penalties prescribed in the bill. In this the defendant can insist upon and successfully defend himself by showing that the order of the Commission is unconstitutional and beyond the powers of the Commission; that the rate prescribed is unconstitutional because it does not afford just compensation. In any criminal prosecution, or in any action to enforce a penalty based upon a statute, the constitutional rights of the defendant can always be asserted and maintained. The risk the defendant railway company would incur in ignoring a penal provision, in taking the chances of prosecution, is not other than nor different from the risk any defendant runs who persists in violating a penal statute—the risk that he may be mistaken as to its constitutional validity. But because of the willingness to run such risk, I do not think it is incumbent on us to extend, by our act, any greater favor in this case than in the case of other penal statutes. And (3) in the paragraph found on page 16 of the bill, providing that the Commission, or any party injured, may apply to the circuit court for an enforcement of the order. The term "regularly made" is manifestly not used in the limited sense that mere formalities have been observed, but in the general sense that it is in all respects "regular," or, in other words, "lawfully made." Such an order is not regularly made if beyond the competency or power of the Commission, for, be it always remembered that the Commission has no power to make other than "a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate," or, in other words, a rate that affords just compensation to the carrier. The jurisdiction of the Commission and the constitutionality of the order would, under all circumstances, be involved and passed upon in proceedings to enforce the order. An order is not "regularly made" unless it is within the pale of the Constitution.

My dissent, however, from the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania is based not only upon the reasons I have already given, but I base the same upon more fundamental grounds—grounds that reach to the very theory and structure of our Federal system.

The Constitution is a power of attorney conferred by the people of the United States and by the several States upon our Federal Government; in fact, it is the life-giving force of our Federal system. This instrument distributes the powers of the Federal Government among three separate and distinct departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments—each supreme within its own sphere and function with but one exception, and that is this: The judicial department, not through any express constitutional grant, but through a power resting upon a uniform and continuous construction of the Constitution for upward of a century and so firmly embedded in our judicial system as to have the force of an express constitutional grant, has assumed and still assumes the right at all times to determine whether the two other departments are performing their functions within the pale of the Constitution.

The power to regulate commerce is vested as fully and completely in Congress as the judicial power is vested in the courts. It is only when Congress proceeds outside of the pale of the Constitution—violates the fifth amendment—that the court, under the Constitution, is warranted in restraining or passing upon the action of Congress in exercising this power.

The court can not restrain on any other ground. To attempt to do so, or to attempt to vest the court with power to do so, would be to attempt to divest or withhold from Congress a part of the power conferred upon it—the power to regulate interstate commerce. This power would be lame and impotent and of no value if the courts could stay or thwart the will of Congress on any other ground. It would transfer the regulation of interstate commerce from Congress to the courts, and it would do violence to that distribution of governmental powers provided and contemplated by the Constitution. It would make our Government not one of three departments, but a Government of a single department—the judicial.

The courts are possessed of no greater or other power over an act to regulate railway rates than over any other act of Congress. It is not necessary nor requisite to the validity of any act of Congress that it should in express terms provide for judicial review as to the validity of the act, so long as the courts are open for all cases in law or equity arising under the laws of the United States. Congress can not bar a review. But an act of Congress is not unconstitutional because it fails to provide in express terms for judicial review. If that were necessary or requisite to the constitutional validity of an act, then the number of unconstitutional acts on our statute books would indeed be great. It has never been customary, except in acts relating to the jurisdiction and procedure of our courts, to provide in express terms, in any act, for judicial review as to the constitutional validity of the act. It would be an anomaly in constitutional law if Congress were to be thus subrogated to the courts. It would be as though Congress threw itself on the mercy of the court in the instance of every act. The constitutionality of the legal-tender act, which wrought a revolution in our monetary system—more far-reaching in its consequences than even the bill under consideration—was never questioned or doubted upon the ground that it did not in express terms confer the right of judicial review. And although the act did not in terms provide for such review there was found under it an open avenue to the courts, and the Supreme Court finally passed upon and sustained its validity. The same is true of the tea-inspection act of 1897. The case of Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470) illustrates this. The same is also true of the statute authorizing the Post-Office Department to issue so-called "fraud orders." There has been no impediment to judicial review within the pale of the Constitution in such cases. The case of the People's United States Bank v. Gilson et al., in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri, is an illustration of this, and the case of Public Clearance House v. Coyne (194 U. S., 497) is also in point. Many other instances of similar import could be cited. If the constitutional rights of any person or corporation are invaded by any act of Congress, the courts are open under the general statutes and can grant ample relief to all such persons or corporations, and there should be no discrimination in granting judicial relief.

If Congress—I call attention to this statement—instead of conferring the rate-making power upon the Commission, as proposed in the pending bill, were itself to exercise the power directly by passing an act fixing rates, as it would under the Constitution have the right to do, would such an act be unconstitutional because it did not in express terms provide for judicial review, so long as it left the general judicial door open? Manifestly not. Such an act on that ground would be as valid as the legal-tender act, the tea act, and the postal statute. There is a general statute, an open door, for all persons whose constitutional rights are invaded through which they can invoke and obtain the determination of their constitutional rights, and this door is open to the railways as well as to other litigants, and as long as Congress does not bar this door it violates no provision of the Constitution.

If such an act of Congress as I have suggested—a direct rate-making law without the intervention of a commission—would be valid without an express judicial review provision, then how can an act vesting in a commission, an administrative body and the agent of Congress, the power to make rates under a rule and standard fixed by Congress be unconstitutional because it contains no express provision for judicial review so long as the door for judicial review is not barred, but is left open as in other cases? What Congress can do directly in this case it can do through the intervention of a commission. The only limitation upon its power or the power of the Commission is that found in the fifth amendment. There is a broad open door into the courts for all litigants, railway companies and others. Why should a special door or avenue be given to the railways? The foregoing considerations, baldly and briefly stated, lead me irresistibly to the conclusion that the pending bill is not unconstitutional.

I concur in all that was said by the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania in their most eloquent remarks about upholding and maintaining the integrity of our courts and their jurisdiction. The force of their argument on this point meets my hearty approval. But while such is my attitude to our courts and our judicial system, I would invoke the same principles and the same argument in behalf of the power and integrity of Congress. It is one of the great coordinate departments of our Government. I would do nothing to diminish or withhold from Congress any of the power and dignity that belongs to that body or in any manner to make it unnecessarily subservient to either of the other departments.

The disposition of some of the public press to deprecate and belittle Congress, especially the Senate, can do us no harm among those whose good opinion is worthy of consideration. But to suffer any other department of the Government, directly or indirectly, to derogate or absorb, in any form or by any method, any power or part of a power vested in Congress by the Constitution would do us more harm and be more baneful in its consequences than could possibly result from any public clamor or criticism. I am as unwilling to derogate from Congress any of its constitutional powers as I am unwilling to derogate from the courts any of the powers vested in them by the Constitution.

If the sole ground for supporting a review amendment were that the pending bill is unconstitutional, I could not honestly vote for such amendment on that ground, though I might vote for it on other grounds. It has always been the doctrine of the best class of theologians to stand firm as to essentials, but to be yielding and forbearing as to nonessentials, if necessary to quiet timorous consciences. I am willing to apply such a doctrine to this bill. The main and essential part of the bill is vesting the rate-making power in the Commission. The providing for a special avenue of judicial review within constitutional limits is comparatively and, as regards the main point, less essential. If a review amendment merely prescribing the mode, and not attempting to divest in any shape Congress of its constitutional power to regulate commerce, and not conferring on the courts greater power than that given them by the Constitution—the power to see that Congress keeps within constitutional bounds—is offered, I can support such an amendment, if it will quiet timorous consciences; but I am unwilling to support any amendment that would derogate from Congress any of its just power to regulate commerce. The integrity of Congress is as near and dear to me as the integrity of the courts. I would despoil neither.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask the Senate to pass an order in regard to printing. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], on the 28th of March, asked the Senate to order a reprint of the interstate-commerce act and acts amendatory thereof and the pending bill. I understand that that reprint is already exhausted, and there seems to be a very great demand for these documents. I therefore ask that the Senate order that 5,000 copies of Document No. 292, present session, be printed for the use of the Senate with this change: While the old law and the proposed law, the Hepburn bill, shall appear in parallel columns, the proposed changes in the old law shall be indicated by italics. It is just as easy to print them in italics as in roman, and then you can glance and see in a moment what is old and what is new. If you do not do that, you have to collate and compare in order to discover the differences.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina is a good one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order requested by the Senator from South Carolina will be made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask, in addition to that request, that at the end of the whole document there be printed the various amendments relating to court review which have already been offered, with the name of the author of each, and that that section of the bill introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] relating to court review shall be printed, so that we may have in one document immediately at hand the whole information.

Mr. TILLMAN. I accept that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order to print will be enlarged to cover the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand that the request of the Senator from South Carolina leaves it in parallel columns.

Mr. TILLMAN. In parallel columns, except that the proposed changes in existing law shall be in italics.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is a good suggestion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4300) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13103) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, Mr. BROWNLOW, and Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

GAMBLING IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not object if it requires no discussion and is a short bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. It is the bill (H. R. 10873) to prohibit gambling in the Territories.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is interested in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. The bill will lead to debate. I expect to debate it myself. I know it will take some time, and I do not wish to yield for its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Pension Calendar is in order.

Boatswain Frederick R. Hazard to be a chief boatswain in the Navy from the 1st day of March, 1906, upon the completion of six years' service, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, as amended by the act of April 27, 1904.

Gunner Andrew Olsson to be a chief gunner in the Navy from the 16th day of September, 1904, upon the completion of six years' service, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, as amended by the act of April 27, 1904.

POSTMASTERS.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Ellsworth F. Pike to be postmaster at Franklin (late Franklin Falls), in the county of Merrimack and State of New Hampshire.

John T. Welch to be postmaster at Dover, in the county of Strafford and State of New Hampshire.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Frederick H. Bartleson to be postmaster at Sharpsville, in the county of Mercer and State of Pennsylvania.

VIRGINIA.

J. Harvey Furr to be postmaster at Waynesboro, in the county of Augusta and State of Virginia.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 2, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 13113), making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. GARDNER of Michigan, Mr. BROWNLOW, and Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts.

HAZING AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on Senate bill 3899, and ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report, and ask that the statement be read.

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows:

In section 1, line 5, of said amendment, after the word "of," insert the following: "the facts upon which are based."

At the end of section 1 of said amendment add the following: "And the truth of any issue of fact so raised, except upon the record of demerit, shall be determined by a board of inquiry convened by the Secretary of the Navy under the rules and regulations for the government of the Navy."

And the House agree to the same.

EDWARD B. VREELAND,
GEO. A. LOUD,
L. P. PADGETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
CHARLES DICK,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The statement was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 3899, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying report as to each of the Senate amendments, namely:

In section 1 of the bill the Superintendent of the Naval Academy is required to state to the Secretary of the Navy his reasons for recommending the dismissal of any midshipman. The amendment as agreed to requires him to state "the facts upon which such reasons are based."

The effect of the second amendment as agreed to, to the same section, is to require a board of inquiry to determine and report to the Secretary of the Navy upon questions of fact which may be alleged as reasons for such dismissal.

EDWARD B. VREELAND,
GEORGE A. LOUD,
L. P. PADGETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to agree to the conference report.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I understand that the conferees and managers adopted the House bill. Is that the case?

Mr. VREELAND. The Senate conferees practically adopted the House substitute as it passed in the House, with two slight amendments.

Mr. RIXEY. That amendment as I understand, applies to the first section?

Mr. VREELAND. To the first section only.

Mr. RIXEY. And as I understand it, a midshipman, where there is a difference as to the facts, has the right to a board of inquiry.

Mr. VREELAND. That is the purport of the amendment.

Mr. RIXEY. It safeguards the right of the midshipmen.

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

LIABILITY OF EMPLOYERS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 239, with the committee amendments, known as the "employers' liability bill."

The bill as amended was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 239) relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees.

Be it enacted, etc., That every common carrier by railroad engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or between the several States, or between any Territory and another, or between any Territory or Territories and any State or States, or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, shall be liable to any of its employees, or, in the case of his death, to his personal representative for the benefit of his widow and children, if any, if none, for his next of kin dependent upon him, for all damages which may result from the negligence of any of its officers, agents, or employees, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works.

SEC. 2. That in all actions hereafter brought against any such common carriers by railroad to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee.

SEC. 3. That no contract of employment, insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity for injury or death entered into by or on behalf of any employee, nor the acceptance of any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity by the person entitled thereto, shall constitute any bar or defense to any action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to or death of such employee: Provided, however, That upon the trial of such action against any such common carrier by railroad the defendant may set off therein any sum it has contributed toward any such insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee, or, in case of his death, to his heirs at law.

SEC. 4. That no action shall be maintained under this act, unless commenced within two years from the time the cause of action accrued.

SEC. 5. That nothing in this act shall be held to limit the duty of common carriers by railroads or impair the rights of their employees under the safety-appliance act of March 2, 1893, as amended April 1, 1896, and March 2, 1903.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion is to suspend the rules, and, with the amendments recommended by the committee, pass the bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands a second.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Before the gentleman from Illinois commences to explain the bill, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an amendment which I have prepared may be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that an amendment be read.

Mr. STERLING. I object.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask the gentleman not to object now, but to let the amendment be read.

Mr. STERLING. I reserve the objection until the amendment is read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That every common carrier by railroad engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or between the several States, or between any Territory and another, or between any Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, shall be liable to any of its employees for all damages which may result from the negligence of any of its officers, agents, or employees. And in case of death the personal representative of such decedent employee, who has left him or her surviving a husband, wife, or next of kin, may maintain an action to recover damages for the wrongful acts above set forth against such common carrier by railroad. The damages so recovered shall be for the husband or wife and next of kin, and shall be distributed as unbequeathed assets after the payment of all debts and expenses of administration. But the plaintiff may deduct the expenses of the action and funeral expenses. The damages shall be only a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary injuries resulting from the decedent's death to the person or persons for whose benefit the action is brought."

Mr. STERLING. I object to the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from New York twenty minutes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to modify certain common-law rules with reference to the liability of railroads to their employees for personal injury. The scope of the bill relates to railroads engaged in commerce in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and interstate commerce. The first paragraph of the bill sets aside the doctrine of fellow-servant, and also provides that common carriers engaged in interstate commerce by railroad shall be liable for injury caused by any defect or insufficiency due to their negligence in cars, engines, equipments, roadbeds and right of way, and in methods of operating the road. It abrogates the common-law doctrine of fellow-servant.

The first paragraph abolishes the common-law doctrine of fellow-servant and provides that common carriers of this character shall be liable for personal injury or for the death of the employee, even though it be caused by the negligence of the coemployee. The second section of the bill——

Mr. PAYNE. Is that without regard to the negligence on the part of anybody in the employ of the railroad company, to make them absolutely responsible, to insure them?

Mr. STERLING. It simply provides that they shall recover for an injury caused by the negligence of the company or any employee of the railroad company.

The second section relates to the common-law doctrine of contributory negligence, and in its scope is the same as the first section relating to common carriers by railroad engaged in carrying commerce in the Territories or the District of Columbia or between the States. It adds to the doctrine of contributory negligence a modified form of the doctrine of comparative negligence. It provides that the injured employee or his personal representative in case of death shall not be barred from recovery of damages on account of the negligence of the injured employee, if the negligence of the employee that is injured or killed is slight and that of the railroad company or its employees or agents or officers is gross in comparison with the negligence of the injured employee.

It provides further that the damages shall be diminished in proportion to the negligence attributable to the injured employee or the employee that is killed by the negligence of the company or its agents. The third section relates to the contracts of employment, indemnity, or insurance, which are being used very generally by many of the railroads, which seek to release the railroad company from liability for personal injury to the employee, regardless of whether or not the injury is due to the negligence of the railroad company. These contracts are coming to be very generally used, and I think they ought to be declared as against public policy.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to inquire of the gentleman as to the construction or intention of this act. Is it to make all railroads that are engaged in interstate commerce liable as provided for in the first section, whether the injury or accident happened while the train or the work that the employee was engaged upon was at the time interstate-commerce business? For instance, take the Southern Railroad, which runs from Macon, Ga., to this city; they also run trains that do not come beyond the limits of the State of Georgia. Suppose upon one of these trains that was doing business in Georgia, and did not go beyond the limits of Georgia, an injury should happen to an employee through the negligence of a coemployee, and the suit should be brought and tried in the State court, would this proposed law make the railroad liable in that instance?

I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am in thorough accord with the purpose of this bill, or any bill that proposes to repeal the common law upon the subject of the negligence of the "fellow-servant," which at present makes it impossible for the servant to recover on account of the negligence of the coemployee, when the injured servant has not himself contributed materially to the injury. Our law in Georgia for fifty years has permitted a railroad employee to recover for the negligence of a fellow-servant, when the injured employee is without fault; but I want to inquire what the gentleman thinks is the effect of this act—whether it relates to an injury inflicted by a railroad engaged in interstate commerce, but the suit is brought for damages inflicted while the railroad is engaged in transactions of business which at the instance is not interstate commerce?

Mr. STERLING. I will say in reply to the gentleman that, in my opinion, it will affect the railroads engaged in interstate commerce whether the particular train, or the particular employee that is engaged on any particular train, happens to be at the time engaged in carrying commerce from one State to another or not. I will say, further, that the scope of the bill in that regard is set forth substantially in the same words as the act of Congress relating to safety appliances, approved in 1903, and also in substantially the same words as the arbitration law passed by Congress two or three years ago. I think, and I understand it is the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that that amendment to the safety-appliance law applies to trains of cars on railroads which carry interstate commerce, regardless of whether the particular car that has not the safety appliance is engaged in interstate commerce or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will ask the gentleman one more question, and then I will not trouble him further. Suppose suit is brought for an injury happening under circumstances which the gentleman has last detailed, and suit is brought in the State court, and the State has a law different from the one we have here—for instance, as is the law in the State of Georgia, which does not allow the doctrine of comparative negligence—how will this proposed act affect that?

Mr. STERLING. I think there is no doubt that this statute, within its scope, would control the statutes of the several States. That is one purpose of the bill, to have a uniform rule with reference to the employees engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection; but what would be the effect—would it abrogate the law of my State?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; if the State law is in conflict with it.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STERLING. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. Section 1 of this bill is practically, in its main feature, what we have had in Iowa since 1862, but there is this difference: The Iowa law, first enacted in 1862 and amended in 1873, provides for the negligence of any employee in connection with the operation of the railway when engaged on hazardous business of operating the railway.

Thus it legislates as to a particular class of employees and treats alike all who are engaged in like employment. The question of the constitutionality of the Iowa statute was raised, and it was held valid because it was limited to the dangers of railroading. It did not apply in railway machine shops and other work of that class. The law has worked well in Iowa for forty-four years, and other States have adopted it. But the constitutional objection was avoided there by the form of the law. I suggest that there may be a question raised under the form of this bill, which might easily be avoided. When the subject of the constitutionality of the Iowa law came up it was said that inasmuch as it was limited to that particular hazardous employment and treated all railways alike it was constitutional. Now, railways have machine shops, and this bill the way it is drawn provides that in a machine shop "or works" the same rule would not apply to a railroad machine shop that would apply to an ordinary machine shop.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would apply to employment in a railroad shop where the company is engaged in the manufacture or repair of cars. I think it would apply to trainmen, switchmen, men in the roundhouse that have charge of the engines, and any other employees whose duty relates to or is connected with the business of carrying commerce, but I do not believe it would go any further than that.

Mr. LACEY. The words "or works" are added. In the Iowa law it is provided that where the injury grows out of the hazardous nature of the railway service, and that alone, they shall be liable, and that distinction has been drawn, and the constitutionality of the law sustained because the distinction was drawn; but if you provide a law that will not protect an employee in an ordinary factory and will protect him in the same sort of a factory when run by a railroad there might be a question about the validity or constitutionality of the act. In the light of the decisions in the Iowa law I suggest that care should be exercised to steer clear of constitutional objections.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I think the reason given by the gentleman himself is sufficient to sustain the bill as constitutional. I think it does relate to the extra hazardous occupation of the men employed by the railroad company.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield further, for the reason that my time is too limited.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I did not demand a second for the purpose of opposing this bill, but I did hope to get the amendment which I offered before the House, and I did hope also that the amendment would be considered on its merits, because I believe it improves the first section of this bill very much. I will explain one or two of the provisions of that amendment. The amendment first provides that a husband may have a cause of action for the death of his wife under the same circumstances in which the wife may have a cause of action for the loss of a husband in case of death. I am not so very particular about that provision, but I think it is the law in most of the States, and I think it ought to be incorporated in this bill.

Second, this bill provides for a rule of damages, and it provides that the damages shall be what are considered a just and fair compensation resulting to the person or persons for whom the action may be brought on account of the death of the decedent. This bill says that if a man be killed his widow and children and next of kin dependent on him for support may recover all damages which they may suffer. Now, in my notion, the courts may construe that as allowing the jury to assess damages for loss of society, for wear and tear on the affections, for the affliction and bereavement caused, and for all sorts of loss and damages which the person whose loved one is killed may sustain. That would be entirely unfair. If the courts allowed the jury to do that, they would go into the realm of speculation and guess, and nobody could tell where they would stop, because there would be no limitation or rule of damages. Again, the amendment provides for the distribution of the recovery. The present bill does not provide how it shall be distributed. Now, the amendment provides that it shall not be subject to any of the debts of the decedent, that it shall be distributed as the unbequeathed assets after the payment of debts and expenses of administration. Let me apply this. Suppose an action is brought by a citizen of this District against a corporation in the District. The law of the District provides that damages recovered in this way shall not be subject to the debts of the decedent. An action is brought and two allegations are contained in the complaint, one for the negligence of a coemployee and one because of some defect or insufficiency in the ways or works which is the cause of action under the common law. Both theories are submitted to the jury. The jury returns a general verdict. Now, when it comes to the distribution of this money, according to this bill, the debts must be paid before the distribution. It does not say they shall not be, but debts are always a claim against the personal estate of everyone.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. But that would not be a part of the assets of the decedent. That sum would not constitute any part of the fund——

Mr. DRISCOLL. But that ought to be stated.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Speaker, I will say that the very point which the gentleman is now making was carefully considered by the Judiciary Committee, and the amendment was drafted so that the creditors should not have any claim upon it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But it does not say so in the bill.

Mr. GILLETT of California. In effect it means that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It ought to be stated in the bill that the damages recovered shall not be subject to the debts of the decedent, in order that there may be uniformity of law and that there be no confusion about the distribution of these funds.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I suggest that it has been repeatedly decided that damages recovered for the death of an employee do not constitute any part of the decedent's estate. It is not distributable among the creditors.

Mr. DRISCOLL. They will not if you say so in this bill.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Whether you say so or not.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make an inquiry. This bill is presented under a motion to suspend the rules. A second has been demanded and the two gentleman managing both sides of the discussion are in favor of the bill. We would like to have had some one against it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the only gentleman demanding a second was the gentleman from New York and it was impossible for the Chair to know whether he was for or against the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. But, Mr. Speaker, he stated that he was not opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Not when he demanded a second.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood him to say that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I rose to demand a second, and the gentleman from New York rose at about the same time, and I supposed, of course, he was against the bill; so I surrendered any claim that I might have.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair had been informed at that time that the gentleman was for the bill, the Chair would have recognized some one who was opposed to the bill, but the gentleman from New York was the only Member who demanded recognition.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, on that point I wish to say I asked the gentleman from Illinois who has charge of the bill if there was anybody on the committee who wanted to demand a second and he said he did not think so. I spoke to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], who is against the bill, and told him I would not demand a second if he wished to do so, but I did want to offer this amendment and ask a few questions about this bill. Now, if it is in order and the proper thing to do, I yield the rest of my time to those gentlemen.

Mr. Speaker, this bill contains some provisions for the protection and benefit of employees in the railway service, but they are not all, in my judgment, so clearly and definitely stated as to be free from doubt as to their meaning, and much confusion and a large amount of litigation in their interpretation and construction are quite sure to follow.

Let us anaylze this first section. According to it a railroad company shall be liable to its employees for all damages which may result from the negligence of any of its officers, agents, or employees, and so forth. That is clear enough and not open to more than one construction. It discontinues the common-law rule of fellow-servant. In case of an employee's death, what happens? The company is liable "to his personal representative, for the benefit of his widow and children, if any; if none, for his next of kin dependent upon him," and so forth. Under the common law there is no cause of action for a death loss caused by negligence. Wherever such rights of action now exist they are created by statute, and such statutes have been passed by most, if not all, the States of the Union. Wherever a cause or right of action is entirely of statutory creation, the rights of the plaintiff and the liabilities of the defendant are limited by the scope of the statute. Nothing can be read into it, and it must be strictly construed. Now, an employee is killed by the negligence of his master, a railroad company. An action is brought by the executor of his will or the administrator of his estate. Where there are a widow and children the loss to them resulting from the death of the deceased is assessed in damages. But the question arises, How is it to be administered and how divided by the personal representative? Must the decedent's debts be paid before such distribution? If there is no widow or children, the recovery is for the benefit of "his next of kin dependent upon him." We will assume that this means dependent on him for support. It will be observed that the widow and children may recover for the death loss of the husband and father in any case, whether or not they are dependent on him for support. He is bound to maintain his wife according to his means, and his children until they are old enough to provide for themselves. But they may be independently rich; and yet under this provision they are entitled to damages for his death. But the next of kin can not recover, nor can any recovery be had for their benefit, unless they are dependent on the deceased for support. Suppose they are partly dependent on him and partly self-supporting, what, then, are their rights? Can they recover at all unless they are entirely dependent on him, or can a recovery be had for their partial dependence? These questions occur to me and are sure to arise if this bill becomes a law.

Again, according to what rule will the damages be assessed under the terms of this bill? Damages may be recovered under two heads: First, pecuniary damages, or loss in dollars and cents, caused by the death of the deceased; second, loss of society, affliction, and bereavement, caused by the death of the loved one. The pecuniary damage to the next of kin in most cases can be assessed by a jury with some degree of certainty. The age of the husband and father and his health, his devotion to his family, his earning power, and his prospects may be taken into account, and the age of his wife and the number and ages of his children, their social position, and all the circumstances surrounding the member killed and those who remain may be taken into consideration by the jury in the assessment of damage. But if the jury be permitted to assess damages for loss of society, mental suffering, tear and wear on the affections, affliction, and bereavement, there is no check or limitation which can be placed on the extent of the verdict, and the jury can not be prevented from entering the realm of speculation and guessing as to the amount of damage. My notion is that the damages should be limited to the strictly pecuniary loss of those entitled under the statute to recover.

The bill creates a new cause of action where none has heretofore existed under the Federal law. Therefore it should be reasonable, conservative, and especially it should be clear, definite, and certain, so that it may be readily understood and easily applied. Of course if it will die in the Senate, which fate is to be feared, it makes little difference how drastically or conservatively it is drawn. I trust that will not happen, and therefore hope that it may be made as practical and workable as possible.

The last clause in the first section provides that a railroad company shall be liable for an injury to or death of an employee "by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways, or works." That is the common law now, only that the common law is more comprehensive. Generally a statute in derogation of the common law is strictly construed "expressio unius est exclusio alterius." It may be held that since this is in substance a codification of the law, a civil code so far as it goes, a cause of action can not be predicated on any defects or insufficiencies not specifically mentioned in this enumeration. Is a telegraph pole or other obstruction on a railroad, and so close to the track that a brakeman climbing up the side of a car may strike it, a defect or insufficiency? Is a low bridge, which will not clear a brakeman standing on a box car, a defect or insufficiency? Is the absence of proper and necessary rules for the protection of employees a defect or insufficiency on which a cause of action may be predicated under the provisions of this bill?

It may be claimed that the negligence in not preparing and promulgating such rules would be chargeable to the officers or agents of the company, and that a cause of action for such negligence would be included in the first provision of this section. I don't think so. Perhaps the enforcement of rules may be by the corporation committed to agents, and for their carelessness in the discharge of that duty an injured employee may have a good cause of action under the first part of this section. But the establishment of rules, in the first instance, is a duty which the common law imposes on the master, the railroad corporation, and until that is done no employee, high or low in authority, can be guilty of negligence with reference to them. Under this section it looks as if an employee injured because of the absence of such rules will have no redress. Further, suppose a "common carrier by railroad" is a natural person, it is quite clear there can be no recovery by employees for the neglect to establish such rules.

The range of possibility of accidents in the operation of a great railway system is practically unlimited, and there are many dangers to which employees may be subjected which are not specifically mentioned in this list of defects or insufficiencies. This attempted codification will work an injury rather than a benefit to the employees. In this particular respect it will probably prove to be a gold brick.

What is the meaning of this last clause in the first section on the question of assumed risk? It lays down a rule as to what negligence will make out an affirmative or prima facie cause of action against the defendant railroad company. Can the defense of assumed risk be pleaded and established under it? The cars, engines, or appliances may be defective and dangerous, but if the employee prior to the accident knew of such dangerous and defective condition and remained in the service, under the common-law rule he is held to have assumed the risk and can not recover. The defense of assumed risk may be meritorious under some conditions and on some facts and should be allowed, and in other cases it is harsh, and even cruel, and should not, on the substantial merits, be permitted to defeat an otherwise good case. If an ordinary tool or simple piece of machinery be defective and dangerous and the operator has learned that fact and continues to use it, even without complaint, there is no good reason why the master should be liable to him in case of an accident. His opportunity of knowing of the danger to which he is being exposed is better than that of the company, and he should notify the proper authority and have the defect repaired or quit the service.

Take another case. A bridge over a track is so low that it will not clear a man of ordinary stature standing on top of a box car. The brakeman is aware of the fact; so is the company. Complaint will not avail, because it is a structural defect and can not well be remedied. Under the common law the employee must take his chances or leave the service. He is a poor man, with a family dependent on him for support. He must work, and continues in the service. By and by, during a dark, stormy night, the whistle sounds for brakes. He rushes on deck in great excitement to stop the train and avoid a wreck. He can not determine his exact location or proximity to the bridge. But it happens that he reaches the deck just as the train is passing under it. He is struck and injured or killed. It can not be said that he is guilty of contributory negligence under those circumstances; yet, under the common law, no recovery can be had, for he is held to have assumed the risk. This is a very unreasonable and hard rule. If it be the intention of the gentleman who reported this bill to eliminate the common-law doctrine of assumed risk, that should be stated. If it is their intention that it should continue in force and applicable to the construction of this statute, that should be stated. And if it be their intention to modify it in any measure or in any degree, that also should be stated.

The amendment which I have proposed clearly states for whose benefit an action may be brought in case of a death, and it permits the husband to recover for the loss of his wife. It allows damages to the father and mother and next of kin, according to their dependence on the deceased for support. If an aged and destitute couple have two sons who maintain them in comfort, and one is killed through the negligence of a railroad company, this amendment permits them to recover although not wholly dependent on that son for support; and permits sisters or brothers to recover, according to the degree of dependence for support on the decedent.

This amendment fixes a rule of damages in case of death, and confines it to the pecuniary injuries resulting from the decedent's death to the person or persons for whose benefit the action is brought. It also provides for the distribution of the damages recovered in cases of death loss. This is in substance an enabling act for the relief of those dependent or partially dependent on the deceased for support. The power which creates the cause of action has the right to say how the proceeds shall be disposed of. They should not be subject to decedent's debts, but should go to the husband, wife, children, parents, brothers, sisters, and other next of kin, according to the pecuniary damage resulting to them from his death. It also eliminates from this bill the enumeration of defects and insufficiencies in cars, locomotives, appliances, etc., on which actions of negligence may be predicated. All these defects and insufficiencies have been made the bases of recovery by numberless decisions in common law; and there are, in my judgment, many acts of negligence of which railroad companies may be guilty, not mentioned there, and others may arise and occur in the future development and complicated conditions of great railway systems. It is better and safer to make no attempt at codification of all possible acts of negligence.

I will vote for this bill in the hope that its imperfections may be corrected, and that it may be "whipped into shape" by the Senate, because it embodies at least one excellent provision. It abolishes the ordinary common-law defense of fellow-servant, and permits one employee to recover for an injury caused by the negligence of a coemployee. There may be instances where this departure from the common-law doctrine will result in hardship to the railroad companies, but in the great majority of cases, as applied to modern railroading, it is just and fair and should be recognized as a correct rule of law.

Two men are at work in a ditch, and one strikes the other with his pick or shovel. Two men are pounding at an anvil, and one delivers a careless blow, injuring the other. Two men are lifting a piece of timber and one negligently lets his end fall, injuring the other. There is no good reason why the common master should be liable in any of these cases; because when two men are engaged in such employment, where they can observe each other daily, each may have a better opportunity than the master of learning the habits and character of the other. The rule which is sought to be abolished in this bill arose and became a part of the common law before the high development of our industrial conditions, when only a few men worked together side by side on the farm or in the small shop, and there was comparatively little danger of accident, and each had a fair chance of protecting himself against the negligence of his coworkers.

In modern railroading these conditions are entirely changed. And yet the common-law rule which originated under entirely different circumstances is continued in force in many of the States and applied by the courts with unrelenting severity. Under it the master is not liable to one servant for injuries caused by the negligence, carelessness, or misconduct of a fellow-servant engaged in the same general business. This is true, although the grade of the employment is different and the one injured is subject to the orders and control of the one by whose negligence the injury is caused, the test generally being whether they are under the same general control and management. It is true that the master is bound to exercise reasonable care in the employment of reasonably competent coservants; but having discharged that duty he is not responsible to one servant for any degree of carelessness on the part of another. He is liable to his servants for the negligence of any employee, from superintendent down, in the discharge of those particular duties which pertain to the master. That, however, affords but very little relief in actual practice, for the reason that a very large proportion of accidents in railroading are caused by the negligence of some of his employees who are not at the time discharging the duty of the master. Practically all of the employees of great railroad corporations are held to be coservants; and accidents are constantly occurring, resulting in bodily injuries and death, for which no recoveries can be had by the application of this rule.

For instance, an engineer on the New York Central system runs the Empire State Express from New York to Albany, where a drunken switchman is asleep at his post, and runs him into eternity. A train is stopped out in the country, and a stupid or tired brakeman neglects to hasten back and signal a following train, and a wreck occurs. A careless engineer misreads an order, and instead of taking a side track continues on a main line until he is stopped by a head-on collision. A love-sick messenger is guilty of an error in receiving and transmitting an order, and several lives are lost. A shiftless workman leaves an obstruction on a track, and a train is derailed at full speed. In all these cases and in others beyond the possibility of enumeration or description, faithful, capable, and careful men are injured and killed; and there is no redress for the reason that the accidents are caused by the careless acts of others, and those others are held by the courts to be co-employees. The locomotive engineer may be an absolute stranger to the switchmen, signalmen, messengers, operators, section bosses, trackmen, bridge tenders, and other employees along the line. He may have had no opportunity whatever of knowing them or anything about them, their habits, character, or experience. Yet he is obliged by law to assume all the risks and dangers of their carelessness; and if he is injured through the negligence of any one of them he has no redress. He has no opportunity of learning as to their fitness. He has no power to hire or discharge. He has no control or authority over them. He is expected to do his part of the work, and they theirs. Yet each is required to assume the risk caused by the carelessness of the others. This hard-and-fast rule has been abolished or modified in many European countries and in several of our States. In Illinois and some other States where it is not discontinued by statute, it is very much relaxed in its application by the courts, while in New York and some other States, it is retained and applied in all its rigor. We complain not of the judges, whose duty it is to interpret and apply the law as they find it. This they do ably and conscientiously. Our contention is that this rule of common law should be modified by statute. As applied to railroading, and especially the transportation or running department in which most of the accidents occur, this rule is bad in principle and worse in practice. The railroads of our country are being united into a few great systems, and if this combination and concentration continue all may be put under one head or management. Now, if an engineer or trainman leaves one company he may not readily secure employment in another without a certificate of character from his last employer. He must work to earn his daily bread, and it is not fair to compel him to assume the risk of accidents caused by other employees in a very large, complicated, and dangerous service.

But it may be said that each employee has a cause of action against any other through whose negligence he has suffered injury. That is true in theory, but practically it is no protection, because the coemployee in almost all cases is financially irresponsible.

Common carriers by railroads take special pains for the care and safety of their passengers. Why? Because they must respond in damages to them for the carelessness of their employees. Were they held liable to one servant for the injuries suffered through the negligence of another in the running service they would exercise greater care. They would be more particular in the employment and distribution of their men, more vigilant in watching them, and more careful about their habits and character, and they would look to it that those men were not overworked in the freight service and rendered unfit to discharge the responsible duties imposed on them. Fewer accidents would occur and fewer limbs and lives would be lost.

Railroads should not be the objects of hostile legislation. They have been wonderful instrumentalities in subduing and developing our land and in building up our industries, and they should not be crippled or their usefulness impaired. Their managers are men of remarkable ability and enterprise, else they would not be there. As individuals they may be gentlemen of large hearts and broad sympathies. But they are bent on extending their lines, making money, and paying dividends. The companies have no hearts, and no sensations except through their financial nerves. The only manner in which they can be persuaded to take reasonable care of their employees is by holding them responsible in damages for the absence of such care. This is not unjust to the companies. Under this bill they are all treated alike. If they must raise passenger and freight rates to meet the demand of extra protection and expense under the operation of this law, let it be done. But let the employees be protected as far as may be, and if killed in the service through no fault on their part let their families have some adequate redress.

Again, railroad companies are quasi public servants. They receive from the State charters and franchises with large powers and privileges, and in return for those they are under some obligations. Those companies and their employees are not the only ones interested in their relations of master and servant and not the only ones concerned in the protection of the health and lives of the employees. There is a third party, the public—society. If the breadwinner of a family is killed, his wife and children are thrown on the city or town for support. If he is crippled for life, he and his family become burdens on society. Every able-bodied man who is impaired in usefulness or killed is a loss, and no matter how broadly that loss may be distributed it becomes a burden on society. It is the right and duty of society to protect itself in this regard, and in that protection it is justified in requiring railroad companies, under reasonable laws and regulations, to assume the burdens created by them and provide for the support of those they have crippled and for the families of those they have left destitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields the remainder of his time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this measure, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended one hour, thirty minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that time for debate be extended one hour, making thirty minutes additional time upon each side. Is there objection?

Mr. STERLING. I object, Mr. Speaker. Well, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of a proper law imposing upon common carriers responsibility for injuries to their employees that are the result of the carelessness of coemployees. I believe now, and always have believed, that that responsibility ought in justice and equity to be carried by the employer rather than by the employees who have no authority over their fellow-servants. The employer who selects and controls his servants should be responsible to all for the result of their carelessness. But section 2 of the pending bill, in my opinion, is not only unwise, but will result in the ultimate defeat of the measure. That section revolutionizes the generally accepted doctrine of contributory negligence, and provides the illogical and impracticable principle of comparative negligence in its stead. The principle of comparative negligence has been repudiated by nearly every State in the Union. It introduces into every personal-injury case a metaphysical element that it is impossible to administer with any degree of justice or certainty. It is speculative and unscientific and is a dangerous principle to embody in any kind of legislation. The first section of the bill is a radical departure from principles of the common law that have been recognized all over this country, but the principle of holding the employer liable for injuries to one employee resulting from the negligence or inefficiency of a coemployee is just and humane and I am in favor of it, but I am not in favor of a law that allows one who is injured through his own negligence to recover damages from anyone else for that injury.

Most of the States in the Union have statutes making railroad companies responsible to employees for injuries that are inflicted upon them by the carelessness and negligence of coemployees. As I said a moment ago, I believe in those laws and will be glad to support any bill embodying that idea. My only objection to this bill is to the provisions contained in section 2 relating to the question of comparative negligence. I oppose that provision on the ground that it is impracticable and dangerous.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I interrupt here because I heard the gentleman from Indiana say that he had no objection especially except to section 2. In this connection I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What effect, if any, in his opinion, would the enactment of this bill into law have toward ousting State courts of jurisdiction in suits of this kind, Congress being supreme in all matters of interstate-commerce regulation?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a matter to which I have given but little thought.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is a very important one.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My offhand impression is that it would not transfer jurisdiction of this class of cases from the State courts to the Federal courts, because it is only an incident of interstate commerce. But suits under this bill, if it should become a law, would be transferable to the Federal courts, because they would necessarily involve Federal questions. What I mean is that this bill would not abrogate State laws on the same subject, and suits under State laws would not be transferable to the Federal courts. Regulation of employees in their relations to the employer in interstate transportation is only an incident of commerce and is under the police control of the States. It is doubtful in my mind if this bill would be held to operate at all outside of the Territories and the District of Columbia. Personal-injury cases, even against interstate transportation companies, have always been regarded as local and subject only to State laws, and when they are removed to the Federal courts under the rule of diverse citizenship the rights and liabilities of the parties are always determined by the laws of the State where the injury occurred. Of course, this doctrine does not apply in the Territories and the District of Columbia.

This bill ought to be discussed more thoroughly and exhaustively than it can be on a motion to suspend the rules, when the time for debate is limited to twenty minutes on a side and no amendments can be offered. When I came into the Hall this morning I had no thought that the bill would come up in this manner, and I have had no time to give any considerable attention to its provisions. I want to assist in the enactment of a law containing the coemployee liability feature, but I confess I have little respect for the doctrine of comparative negligence. I know something of its operation in the State of Illinois, where it has been practically abandoned in recent years. It abolishes the principle of contributory negligence. Section 2 provides that the fact that an injured employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not be a bar to recovery where his negligence was slight. By what standard can it be determined whether negligence is slight, ordinary, or gross? It is a pure matter of speculation. It has been asserted that under the common-law doctrine of contributory negligence an employee can not recover for an injury if his negligence, however slight, contributed to bring it about. Contributory negligence, to defeat a recovery, must be a substantial departure from that degree of care that a man of ordinary prudence would exercise under similar circumstances.

By increasing the responsibility of railroad companies we make them more vigilant in employing capable and trustworthy men and in maintaining the best possible equipment. They will be prompted to adopt every safeguard to promote safety of transportation and to protect the traveling public and their own employees. On the other hand, trainmen should feel some responsibilities. The men who run railroad trains and have in charge the safety of the traveling public are the most intelligent and trustworthy class of men in the country. They are prompted to adopt every safeguard for the protection of life and limb not only by a high sense of duty, but by considerations of personal safety as well. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield that minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask unanimous consent that the views which I have printed as minority views may be taken as a part of my remarks.

They are as follows:

The questions as to how far employers should be liable to their employees for the acts of fellow-servants, the degree of contributory negligence on the part of the person injured that should bar a recovery, and the extent to which the contract of employment should govern are of the utmost importance, and the considerations in favor of a relaxation of the strict rules of the common law have caused the passage and amendment of numerous State statutes, under which experience is teaching how the good of the community may be best obtained.

But these questions should be governed by the law of the State having jurisdiction of the employment, and the jurisdiction of the contract of service should not be made national because the employer is engaged in interstate commerce. The attempt to pass such a law will cause inextricable confusion as to where the State and national law should govern, especially in the case of local employees. It will abolish the advantage of practical experience, testing the value of the various State provisions, and the plaintiff will be sent to the distant, crowded, and expensive forum of United States courts, and the cause of the employee is more likely to be hurt thereby than aided by anything contained in this bill.

I sympathize with proper expansion of the right of an employee to recover for accidents in a dangerous occupation, employing hosts of men whose negligence may cause irremediable personal injury to each other; but I think this modification of the common law should and will be provided by the various States and that this bill will be an injury to those that it attempts to benefit. It is a question whether we can legislate as to all employees, as for example, if a couple of men are shoveling dirt into a railroad car and one happens to hit the other with a shovel. But even in the most pitiful cases of injury it will not help the parties that the railroad should have the right to remove the suit to a United States court, and thereby to take that suit to a distant court with a crowded calendar which may not be called for years. Pass this bill and it would add 20,000 cases in the United States courts and subject plaintiffs to appeals to the United States courts of appeal which, if these cases be added, might take ten years. I think my minute is about up. I do not believe in that legislation which will cause this result, and I doubt also whether it be constitutional to take all questions between employer and employee away from the State.

Mr. STERLING. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The Chair was in error. The gentleman from Indiana has seven minutes still remaining.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, there is no contract, except perhaps that of marriage, which goes deeper into those personal rights of man and man which are reserved to the States than the contract of employment and the rights as between employer and employee, as well as the right of suit for personal injury caused by the negligence of another. I can not believe that it is for the benefit of the people of the United States that the jurisdiction of the States over these matters should be infringed. I doubt whether the power to regulate interstate commerce carries with it the power to change this relation between employer and employee. If it be so, and if this were the best bill in the world, the confusion that would take place on a railroad which does some of its business outside of a State and some of its business inside of a State would be inextricable. It would lead to various decisions, varying judgments, and to difficulties which would not tend to the benefit of those whom this legislation attempts to benefit. I therefore am opposed to this legislation, believing that all these questions are benig worked out in the various States by various statutes; that the best statute will prove its right to remain, and that the worst will be amended so as to be like the best.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the gentleman moved to suspend the rules and to pass this bill under such circumstances that we can not have ample opportunity to discuss it. I think the bill with ample discussion would be better understood, and perhaps we would feel a little freer about what we should do in the matter of voting for it. I shall be compelled to vote against it, as at present advised, because I do not believe it is constitutional. I do not believe that under that provision of the Constitution of the United States such a law is constitutional because it is regarded as regulating interstate commerce. I read from the third clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, in which it gives power to Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes:"

Now, it is said we have the power to regulate commerce and provide rules that are to be applied in court in determining the measure of damages between litigants. Does that regulate commerce? Is there a decision of any court in the United States that recognizes that principle? If it is not constitutional in that respect, it is wholly unconstitutional.

Besides, I am satisfied that the first section lays down an illiberal rule, in some respects, for employees in bringing suit against the railroad company where the coemployee has been guilty of some negligence. In my own State, and other States, I know we have rules that are properly applicable in cases of that kind. The second section, as the distinguished gentleman from Indiana has said, undertakes to lay down a rule that requires the court to submit the whole question of contributory negligence to a jury, they to determine what is slight and what is gross negligence, and to apportion it. The rule of slight negligence is one well understood, and I am sorry we have not time to consider it here. Many persons have recovered, under the rules of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the States, who have been guilty of some slight negligence that did not directly contribute to the injury—that is, to the proximate cause of the injury complained of. A person may recover in these damage suits, although he has been guilty of some form of negligence. A woman in this city a few years ago passed safely over a railroad line and was frightened at a car coming, jumped off, and was injured after she got off. It was contended that it was her own negligence in jumping off the car that caused the injury. The Supreme Court of the United States unanimously said that she acted according to the surroundings and environment, and while it was a very negligent act in jumping off the car, that it was not the proximate cause of the injury, and she recovered. Mr. Speaker, there are other objections and I feel that the bill ought not to pass. It is not regulation of interstate commerce to provide that contracts between railroad companies as to insurance shall be void. So as to fixing a rule of recovery by an employee against a railroad company. It is not good policy to put it in the power of a railroad to take all damage cases into the United States courts.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is to suspend the rules and pass the bill. The bill is not subject to amendment under this motion. It requires a vote of two-thirds to suspend the rules and pass it. If the motion is voted down the bill will not be defeated, but will remain on the Calendar to be called up for consideration in the regular way. Therefore a vote against the motion to suspend the rules is not a vote against the bill; it is a vote to consider it regularly, when there may be more time to devote to it and when it may be open to amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to make a law which is to be known as the "employers' liability act," similar to laws which have been adopted by almost every civilized nation using the common law in the world, and by many of the States in this Union. Under the common law where an injury to one of the employees occurs by reason of the negligence of a coemployee the employer is not liable. Such a law was well applicable where a man had only two or three servants employed under him, but it has no application in justness or fairness to the great corporations of our country, such as the railroad corporation. In three months of last year there were 931 railroad employees killed at their posts of duty. In three months of last year there were 13,217 railway employees injured at their posts of duty, not mentioning those who met such slight injuries as only required a lay off of two or three days. These injuries largely occurred through the negligence of fellow-employees. They resulted not only in the injury to the railroad employees themselves, but often they killed passengers who rode upon the railroad. The best inducement that can be offered to the railways to look after their employees and see that they have careful men employed, sober men employed, men employed not more than ten hours and at least not twenty hours at a time without sleep—the best way to enforce this is by requiring them to pay damages when an engineer on duty for twenty hours falls asleep and a collision occurs and injures his fellow-servants.

It may be true that this bill is not perfect in form. I have tried for years in my mind to draft a bill which I thought would be constitutional and would cover the case. It may be true that this bill is not perfect in form, but it meets the wishes of the men who are most interested. It has been prepared by and with the consent of the railway employees, who will benefit by its provisions. The gentlemen who now urge little questions against it as to its technical form may be right; I do not know. They may be opposed to the principle of the bill; I do not know. But I am willing to vote for a bill of this kind which meets justice and which meets the approval of the men who are most interested. It is time that the United States of America, the most civilized of nations, compelled its railway companies to provide every possible means of saving and conserving the lives both of the employees and of the passengers. A bill like this is a long step in the right direction. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted me I wish to say this bill comes from the Committee on the Judiciary with a practically unanimous vote. The first section of it abolishes the doctrine of fellow-servants, as the laws of many States in the Union have already done. The second section does not abolish the doctrine of contributary negligence, as some gentlemen seem to think, but it only modifies and mitigates it, and institutes the humane doctrine of comparative negligence where the negligence of the employee has been slight and that of the carrier has been gross and criminal. The third section of this bill has the effect of limiting the binding force of the contracts that are entered into by many railway employees when they enter the service of the railroads. All of these sections are good and humane principles of law. The Committee on the Judiciary has thoroughly considered these propositions from every standpoint. The labor men in the country have come before that committee, and have had all the time they wished, and those representing the carriers and the corporations have presented their side of the proposition. The Committee on the Judiciary has deliberately come to the conclusion that these doctrines as embodied in this bill should be enacted into law. Every one of them is founded on the sound principle of logic, justice, and humanity. I trust that all Members in this House will see proper to support the bill. I do not believe that one fraught with more importance and good to that great class of people interested has ever come before the House of Representatives during my incumbency. It has received my most careful consideration and shall cordially receive my vote, and I call upon all gentlemen, not only on this side of the House of Representatives, but on the other side, to give their support to this measure which is so manifestly just to more than 2,000,000 people engaged in the hazardous occupations and employments of life. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have read this bill very carefully and the very able favorable report recommending its enactment into law. Of course I have not time in one minute to give "the reasons for the faith that is in me." I want merely to say that in my opinion it is needed and wise legislation. I might as well stop with that because I see that the minute is out. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] half a minute.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say this in the short time allotted me, that I am in thorough accord with any bill that properly seeks to give in the trial of these cases in the United States courts the same rights in principle and theory that my native State gives in the trial of such cases in the State courts, and that is that the fact that a railroad employee was injured by the negligence of a coemployee shall not bar his right to recovery when he has been injured. I deem that the principle, the main theory in the bill, is to repeal the old harsh common-law rule in the case of suit by a servant of the interstate railways who has been injured by the negligence of their fellow-servants and permit him to recover for the injury caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant. For this reason I cordially support the bill and hope that it will pass. I think that it could be improved by some amendment I could suggest; but as that can not be done now, rather than endanger its passage, I am satisfied to vote for it as it has been reported.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield one minute of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time remaining.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] be allowed to proceed for one minute in support of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague may be allowed to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will devote the short time given me to a discussion of the first two sections of the pending bill. They are of great importance to the railroad employees of the country. I have not the time for a discussion of the third section.

The purpose of the first section is to change the common-law liability of railroad companies to their employees when it is engaged in interstate commerce or is operating in the District of Columbia or one of the Territories.

It relaxes the strict common-law rule of liability which bars a recovery for damages for personal injury or death of the employee occasioned by the negligence of a coemployee and permits a recovery in such cases.

The fellow-servant doctrine was first enunciated in England in 1837 in the case of Priestley v. Fowler, and since that time has been followed in that country and this, except where abrogated or modified by statute.

So long as the industries of the country were conducted by private persons under their own supervision, the liability of the employer to his employee for injury by the acts of himself or his coemployee was easy of solution, and no statutory enactment was necessary.

These conditions, however, have changed, and the reasons which existed for this doctrine when it was first enunciated no longer exist and it should be changed.

In 1888 England passed an act abolishing the fellow-servant doctrine with reference to the operating of railroad trains, and in 1897 extended the provisions of this law to other hazardous employments.

A great number of the States of the Union have passed laws modifying or abolishing this doctrine. In Iowa this was done as early as 1862, and in the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor such a law has not only been placed upon the statute books, but has been incorporated in the fundamental law of the Commonwealth.

The time has certainly arrived when the National Government should follow the lead of those enlightened and progressive States and do what it can to make this doctrine uniform.

There can be no doubt that the enactment of these laws was wise and has been conducive to greater care on the part of the railroads, and has not only saved the lives and limbs of worthy and deserving employees, but of passengers as well. There can be no doubt that their enactment was just. Under the old fellow-servant doctrine practically no one was responsible for the death of an employee. The co-servant might be held liable, but, as a rule, nothing could be made by suing him, and the employer was exempt from liability. This was a harsh rule to apply to the brave men who are employed to operate the railroads of the country. The rule was not only harsh, but was wrong. The responsibility should be carried by the employers rather than the employees, who have no voice in the selection of or any authority over their fellow-servants, and oftentimes no acquaintance with them or knowledge of their characteristics or habits.

As a member of the Virginia legislature and as a member of the constitutional convention of that State of 1901-2, I had the pleasure to vote for measures abolishing this old and obsolete doctrine, and I am glad to have the opportunity to vote to place upon the national statute books a law abrogating it.

The second section of this bill modifies the common-law rule of contributory negligence. This has my hearty support, though that section is not as strong as I would make it. There are some provisions of the bill I would like to strengthen, but under the rules which now apply no amendment can be considered, and therefore I give the bill in its present form my cordial support.

Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that it will do something toward stopping the fearful slaughter of human life and destruction of human limbs by our railroads. In three months of 1905, 971 railroad employees were killed and 13,217 were injured. If this is a fair average, and I suppose it is, it means that 3,724 human lives are taken and 52,868 human beings were maimed by the railroads of this country each year. Most of the men injured were engaged in the operating departments of the railroads. They are brave and faithful, and are splendid citizens. Their worth is not fully understood nor appreciated by the general public. Sober, silent, and alert, they discharge their dangerous duties with the one desire to serve their company and the public in the best possible manner.

If all the dangers of the rail were as patent to the public as to these men, there would be very little traveling for pleasure. The public hears only of the accidents that occur, and not the thousands that are averted by the cool judgment and leonine courage of the train men. If an accident happens, those in the coaches must be saved, if possible, regardless of the train men. They must stand at their posts, like the Roman sentinels, "though the heavens rain fire."

The purpose of this bill is to give relief against the rigors of the common law to these men and others engaged in this important, extensive, and hazardous industry. It should become a law, and I hope it will. [Loud applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that this bill does not establish the doctrine of comparative negligence in its original form. It modifies that doctrine. Under the doctrine of comparative negligence the injured man, or his representative in case of death, is entitled to recover full damages even though he was guilty of slight negligence, if that of his employer was gross in comparison, but this bill requires the court or the jury to distribute the burden of the injury to those who are responsible for it. It does not bar the right of the injured to recover if he is guilty only of slight negligence, if the negligence of the employer is gross in comparison. In such a case, however, he can not recover full damage for the injury suffered. The amount that he might recover under the old doctrine must be diminished in proportion to the negligence attributable to him. He must pay the penalty of his own negligence; the employer pays the penalty of his. I submit no proposition could be more fair. No other proposition is fair. I desire to quote on this question one of the leading law writers. Beach, in his work on Contributory Negligence, page 136, comments on the law as provided in this section as follows:

> Much may be said in favor of the rule which counts the plaintiff's negligence in mitigation of the damages in those cases which frequently arise, wherein, on one hand, a real injury has been suffered by the plaintiff, by reason of the culpable negligence of the defendant, and yet, where, on the other hand, the plaintiff's conduct was such as to some extent contribute to the injury, but in so small a degree that to impose upon him the entire loss seems not to take a just account of the defendant's negligence. In those cases, which may be denominated "hard cases," the Georgia and Tennessee rule in mitigation of damages without necessarily sacrificing the principle upon which the law as to contributory negligence rests is a rule against which, in respect of justice and humanity, nothing can be said. Where the severity of the general rule might refuse the plaintiff any remedy whatever, as the sheer injustice of the rule, as laid down in Davis v. Mann, would impose the whole liability upon the defendant, it is quite possible to conceive a case where the application of the rule which mitigates the damages in proportion to the plaintiff's misconduct, but does not decline to impose them at all, would work substantial justice between the parties.

Shearman and Redfield on the Law of Negligence, fifth edition, page 158, in speaking of this rule, say:

> This is substantially an adoption of the admiralty rule, which is certainly nearer ideal justice, if juries could be trusted to act upon it.

Many of the States have passed statutes abolishing the doctrine of fellow-servant in the operation of railroads. Some have abolished it as to all hazardous occupation, and a few have eliminated it altogether. The State legislatures of some of the States have greatly qualified the rule of contributory negligence. The courts of the different States have construed the rule differently. Some of the States have declared the contracts referred to in section 3 void as against public policy; some have not. The result of all this is that there is a great diversity of law throughout the country on these questions. This bill will create a uniform rule everywhere, which is greatly to be desired.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. If it is brief I will. I just have one minute.

Mr. PADGETT. I notice the language in section 2 says that where the negligence of the plaintiff was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison. Suppose they are nearly equally balanced, what would be the right to recover?

Mr. STERLING. If the negligence of the plaintiff is more than slight he can not recover at all; if the negligence of the defendant is less than gross, then the plaintiff can not recover at all. Now, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give relief against the rigors of the common law to a class of employees engaged in the most important, the most extensive, and the most hazardous industry and occupation in the country, and it is a just and a righteous proposition and ought to become the law of the land. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules, agreeing to the amendments, and passing the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed. [Applause.]

FORTIFICATION OF PURE SWEET WINES.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 15266, with committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules, agree to the amendment, and pass the bill, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is this the proper place to demand a second?

The SPEAKER. No; the bill will be reported first. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15266) to amend existing laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 43 of the act entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved October 1, 1890, as amended by section 68 of the act of August 27, 1894, be further amended, so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 43. That the wine spirits mentioned in section 42 of this act is the product resulting from the distillation of fermented grape juice, to which water may have been added prior to, during, or after fermentation, for the sole purpose of facilitating the fermentation and economical distillation thereof, and shall be held to include the product from grapes or their residues, commonly known as grape brandy; and the pure sweet wine, which may be fortified free of tax, as provided in said section, is fermented grape juice only, and shall contain no other substance whatever introduced before, at the time of, or after fermentation, except as herein expressly provided; and such sweet wine shall contain not less than 4 per cent of saccharine matter, which saccharine strength may be determined by testing with Balling's saccharometer or must scale, such sweet wine, after the evaporation of the spirits contained therein, and restoring the sample tested to original volume by addition of water: Provided, That the addition of pure boiled or condensed grape must or pure crystallized cane or beet sugar to the pure grape juice aforesaid, or the fermented product of such grape juice prior to the fortification provided by this act for the sole purpose of perfecting sweet wines according to commercial standard, or the addition of water in such quantities only as may be necessary in the mechanical operation of grape conveyors, crushers, and pipes leading to fermenting tanks, shall not be excluded by the definition of pure sweet wine aforesaid: Provided, however, That the cane or beet sugar, or water, so used shall not in either case be in excess of 10 per cent of the weight of the wine to be fortified under this act: And provided further, That the addition of water herein authorized shall be under such regulations and limitations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time prescribe; but in no case shall such wines to which water has been added be eligible for fortification under the provisions of this act where the same, after fermentation and before fortification, have an alcoholic strength of less than 5 per cent of their volume."

SEC. 2. That section 49 of the said act, approved October 1, 1890, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 49. That wine spirits used in fortifying wines may be recovered from such wine only on the premises of a duly authorized grape-brandy distiller; and for the purpose of such recovery wine so fortified may be received as material on the premises of such a distiller, on a special permit of the collector of internal revenue in whose district the distillery is located; and the distiller will be held to pay the tax on a product from such wines as will include both the alcoholic strength therein produced by the fermentation of the grape juice and that obtained from the added distilled spirits, subject, however, to the provisions of section 3309 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 6 of the act entitled 'An act to amend the laws relating to internal revenue,' approved March 1, 1879; and such spirits so recovered may be used by such distiller to fortify wines as authorized by section 42 of the aforesaid act, approved October 1, 1890."

SEC. 3. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to assign at each winery where wines are to be fortified such number of gaugers or storekeeper-gaugers, in the capacity of gaugers, for special duties as may be necessary for the proper supervision of the making and fortifying of such wines, and the compensation of such officers shall not exceed $5 per diem while so assigned, together with their actual and necessary traveling expenses, and also a reasonable allowance for their board bills, to be fixed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but not to exceed $2 per day for said board bills; and to cover the expenses to the Government attending the making and fortification of such sweet wines there shall be levied and assessed against each maker of such wines, and collected monthly, a charge of 3 cents on each taxable gallon of brandy used by him in the fortification of such wines during the preceding month. That bonds hereafter given under the provisions of the aforesaid act of October 1, 1890, as amended, shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax on all brandy removed thereunder and not used and accounted for within the time and in the manner required by law and regulations, and for the payment of all charges herein imposed on the brandy so withdrawn and used; and the said bonds shall contain such other conditions as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

SEC. 4. That where brandy to be used in the fortification of wine is distilled on premises adjacent to the winery premises the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, in his discretion, authorize the erection on either of said premises of fermenting vats for material to be used either in the manufacture of such wines or the brandy to be used in the fortification thereof; and all such materials used or received on either of said premises shall be under the supervision of the officer assigned to such winery, and shall be accounted for at such times and in such manner as the Commissioner may direct.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of sections 3221 and 3223 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by an act approved March 1, 1879, are hereby extended to grape brandy withdrawn for use in the fortification of sweet wines, and which, prior to such use, is accidentally destroyed by fire or other casualty while stored in the fortifying room on the winery premises.

SEC. 6. That any person who by any process recovers from wines fortified under the provisions of the aforesaid act approved October 1, 1890, or amendments thereto, any brandy or wine spirits used in the manufacture or fortification of said wine, otherwise than is provided fact in said act and its amendments, or who shall rectify, mix, or compound with other distilled spirits such fortified wines or grape brandy or wine spirits unlawfully recovered therefrom, shall, on conviction, be punished for each such offense by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000. But the provisions of this section, and the provisions of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, relating to rectification, shall not be held to apply to the blending of pure sweet wines fortified under the provisions of the said act of October 1, 1890, or amendments thereto, where such wines are blended for the sole purpose of perfecting the same according to commercial standard.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands a second.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I object to that.

Mr. DALZELL. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, Mr. NEEDHAM, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 20.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-nine gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The doors will be closed and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of ordering a second will, as their names are called, answer "aye," those opposed will answer "no," and those not voting will answer "present," and the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in the absentees.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 159, nays 46, answered "present" 19, not voting 158, as follows:

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 159; the nays, 93; present, 19. A quorum is present. The yeas have it, a second is ordered, and the doors will be opened. The gentleman from California is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Missouri to twenty minutes.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the sweet-wine law. The original law passed in 1890, and was amended in 1894. Since that time there has been no legislation upon the question. At the time of the passage of the original law and its amendment in 1894, this industry was of small amount. It has grown tremendously, and this bill provides for amendments to the sweet-wine law which are made necessary because of the growth of the industry. This bill, if enacted into law, will permit of the use of small quantities of water in the distillation of grape brandy. It will accurately define the product known as wine spirits and grape brandy as the product of grapes, or their residue. It will permit small quantities of water, not exceeding 10 per cent of the weight of the wine, to facilitate the mechanical operation of the machinery in the manufacture or making of wine; in the recovery of wine spirits it will place it upon the same plane as in the recovery of any other kind of spirits that is at 80 per cent. The bill also places a charge of 3 cents a gallon upon each taxable gallon of wine spirits or grape brandy used in the fortification of wine. At the present time the Government of the United States is expending from $35,000 to $50,000 a year in the supervision of this industry, without any return whatever. This bill, if it passes, will bring in a sum to the Government equivalent to from $105,000 to $125,000. In other words, if this bill passes, this industry will no longer be a charge upon the Government, but will be self-sustaining. It also provides for penalties for violations of the law as amended. Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill has been carefully drawn. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue went to California last fall and observed the operations of sweet-wine making upon the ground. The result of his visit and the consultations which he has had since with the members of the California delegation is the bill now before the House. This bill is indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill was passed through the Committee on Ways and Means by every vote except that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. And, Mr. Speaker, this is in the interest of the whole industry and not against any particular branch of the wine industry, and is demanded by the people of California, in which State 95 per cent of all sweet wine is made. The grape and wine industry is a great and growing industry, and there is now invested in its various adjuncts in California alone about $80,000,000. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this bill has nothing in the world to do with the temperance question. Some Members were very solicitous for fear that the gentleman from California [Mr. NEEDHAM] or myself, one or the other, was advocating a proposition that would cause more wine to be consumed. That is not true. The dispute is as to regulating the making of sweet wine—that's all. Individually, I do not care a straw whether anybody consumes wine or not. I never drink it myself—hardly ever. [Laughter.] As a matter of fact, I am a teetotaler, but I contend that if there is going to be wine made in the United States—and it appears that it is going to be made for all time—then all of the grape producers in the United States and all of the wine makers ought to have a square deal. My observations here in the last seven years have been that there is a good deal of the grab game in legislation here on nearly every subject, and in none more than in this wine business. In the last Congress a gentleman from California [Mr. Bell] introduced a bill which would have shut up almost every winery between the crest of the Rocky Mountains and the Atlantic seaboard. Among hands we killed that bill so dead that it never got out of the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FASSETT] has another bill pending here that, if it ever passes, will shut up three-fourths of the wineries between the top of the Rocky Mountains and the Atlantic seaboard. This bill, called the Needham bill in the papers, is not nearly so obnoxious to the people this side of the Rocky Mountains engaged in the wine business as either the Fassett bill or the Bell bill which was killed in the last session of Congress, but, nevertheless, it is open to several objections. I would remedy it by amendment but for the fact that when a bill is being considered under a motion to suspend the rules amendments can not be offered except by unanimous consent, which I have been notified I can not secure on this occasion.

Climatic conditions determine the kind of grapes which can be grown in any particular locality. It happens that in a certain part of California—not all of California, but in a certain part of it—the conditions are very favorable for the growth of grapes which produce sweet wines. Most of the wines made east of the Rocky Mountains are sour or acid wines. There is no place in the United States where grapes which will make acid or sour wines grow in more luxury and in more perfection than on the bluffs of the Missouri River. At one time Missouri led every State in the Union in the production of grapes and wines. The sour or acid wine industry originated at Cincinnati. Longfellow wrote one of his most beautiful poems in connection with the wine industry in and about that city.

It turns out that the California people are not satisfied with the law as it stands now, and, in my judgment, they never will be satisfied until they get a law passed which shuts up all the other wineries in the United States. What they really want is for Congress to give them a monopoly. I will absolve the gentleman from California [Mr. NEEDHAM] from desiring anything of that sort in this bill, but that is what the wine makers of California desire.

I offered certain amendments to this bill in the committee, and I am going to read them to you. I had some more to offer and would have offered them in the committee, but my amendments were all voted down, and I got tired of offering them and so let up. If these amendments had been adopted, I never would have raised any special objection to this bill; but they were not adopted, and I am going to do all I can to kill the bill, because it is an unfair measure.

The trouble about the sweet-wine business in California at present is that, on account of the large amount of saccharine matter that there is in the grape juice, when they undertake to pipe it from one place to another the saccharine or heavy matter gums up the pipes so that it retards the flow of this juice through the pipe. As I understand it, that is what they are driving at—trying to remedy that. I want to read to you some of these amendments that I offered. On page 1 of this bill it provides:

SEC. 43. That the wine spirits mentioned in section 42 of this act is the product resulting from the distillation of fermented grape juices.

I offered an amendment in the committee to strike out the word "grape" and insert the word "fruit." I did it for this reason: You can make just as good alcohol or brandy for the purpose of fortifying sweet wines out of any sort of fruit juice as you can out of grape juice, and there is a great deal more fruit juice in the United States in one shape and another than there is of grape juice. So there is neither sense nor justice in restricting it to "grape juice."

I offered to strike out the word "grape," in line 11, and insert the word "fruit." That was voted down. Then in the same line, after the words "juice," I offered to insert, in connection with it, "fermented fresh fruit, fermented dried fruit or fermented residue of fruit."

Now, the truth is, as persons who are not familiar with distillation will find out when the denatured alcohol bill comes up for discussion, you can make a prime article of alcohol out of any vegetable, plant, grain, or root that contains starch or sugar in large quantities. What, then, is the sense in restricting this thing simply to grape juice? Fermented fresh fruit will make as good alcohol or brandy as grapes will, or as good wine and spirits, or whatever you call it. It is all the same thing in the end. Fermented dried fruit or fermented residue of fruit will also produce just as good alcohol. Nobody will claim that any of these substances is any more deleterious than grape alcohol or grape brandy.

The third amendment that I offered was after the word "water," in line 11, to insert the words "cane sugar, beet sugar, corn or starch sugar, rock candy, honey, sirups, or molasses." Not a single, solitary one of these articles is deleterious to the constitution of man if taken in reasonable quantities.

The fourth amendment was to strike out all of line 13 except the word "and" and insert "to which water may have been added after fermentation for the sole purpose of facilitating the economical distillation thereof."

I say that my proposition to add water at one stage of the process of distillation is just as reasonable as for the gentleman from California to want to add water at another stage of the process of distillation. The truth about the whole thing is that the more water you get into it, the better the world will be off anyhow. [Laughter.]

Now, recollect that the proponents of this bill want water added before the process of fermentation sets up simply to expedite the passage of the grape juice from one part of the apparatus for distilling to another, and this amendment of mine provides that after the process of fermentation is set up a reasonable quantity of water—the quantity to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue—shall be added for the purpose of facilitating the distillation.

Now, if these gentlemen had accepted these amendments, with a few more that I had, there wouldn't have been any row about it. [Laughter.]

The fifth amendment was, on page 2, after the word "sugar," to insert "corn or starch, rock candy, honey, sirup, or molasses, all in the natural form or dissolved in water."

The way it reads in the bill is:

Provided, That the addition of pure boiled or condensed grape must or pure crystallized cane or beet sugar to the pure grape juice aforesaid.

I put it to you as a matter of common sense, how does it happen that crystallized sugar is healthy and raw sugar is not healthy? It suits the convenience of our California brethren to use that particular phraseology, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I want to state to the gentleman that those words are in the present law and were put in for the benefit of you people.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I don't care who put them in or what law they are in. They were not put in for the benefit of anybody I know of, except for the benefit of California.

The sixth amendment is, after the word "aforesaid," in line 12, to insert "crushed fruit before fermentation is complete."

The very same reason applies to that that applies to the other—that the juice of the fruit is as good as the juice of the grape—and if one man has a kind of grape juice that some of the fruit juice will make a better wine out of he ought to be permitted to put it in. You can not drink the wine made out of tart or sour grapes without adding water and sugar to it, which is called "gallizing," and which is both a scientific and legitimate performance. It happens that out in California there is a small stretch of country in which the grapes have so much sugar in them that they do not have to add sugar to the juice to make wine. As a matter of fact, I understand it to be the case that sometimes, on account of the peculiarity of the season, they have to add acid to the grape juice to make good wine.

The next amendment is, in line 13, after the word "or," to insert "with the addition of crystallized cane or beet sugar, or rock candy, either in natural form or boiled in enough water only so as to dissolve it, to the fermented product of such grape juice," etc.

I repeat the statement I made about the others, that if they are prepared to add what they wanted to it could not hurt a bit by the addition of crystallized cane or beet sugar, or rock candy, either in its natural form, etc., and the other amendments are all of the same character. I do not believe that Congress ought to be interfering with the private business of the country by eternally undertaking to exploit one man's particular methods—methods of production—at the expense of another's.

My own judgment on the matter is that in passing bills of this class generally the Members of the House ought to give a great deal more attention to them than they do. This bill, instead of being brought here to be passed under suspension of the rules, where we have twenty minutes on a side to discuss it, ought to have been brought up in the regular way, so that we would have had as much time as we wanted to explain the bill and to pick it to pieces if one did not like it. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as one of the committee that reported this bill, I want to say a few words. I was in favor of several of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Of course we understand the parliamentary situation here. The bill is not amendable under suspension of the rules. Mr. Speaker, all that this bill does is to enable water to be added to the grape must, out of the fermentation of which wine proceeds. The California grape is a very rich, pulpy, sweet grape. With a small winery and very little machinery even that sort of grape is easily handled without adding any water to the pressed-out juice, but as the grape industry in California grew more and more, and as these establishments became very much larger and more complicated, with a lot of machinery and pipes leading from one part to another in which to carry the juice, it was found that the rich, pulpy, sweet juice of the California grape clogged the pipes; and what astonished me most about this legislation when it was presented to the Committee on Ways and Means was the fact that there should be in existence any such law preventing a man from putting water in his grape juice—any need for this legislation. Now, when you get East the grapes are thin and acid, and the juice is a good deal like water after it is pressed out, with a good deal of grape acid in it. The same problem therefore does not present itself with eastern grape must, as there is no danger of that sort of grape juice clogging any pipes.

The present law is so severe that if a man puts even water in the grape juice to make it thinner, so that it shall not clog the pipes, he is subject to a penalty of a fine and imprisonment under the internal-revenue law. As far as the eastern grape grower is concerned that does not bother him, as I have said, because his grape juice is thin and acid, but as far as the Californian is concerned and the man who raises grapes down on the Gulf coast—where there is likewise a rich, sweet, and pulpy grape—it does bother him if he is going into the wine business on a large scale. So that this bill asks that wine makers be permitted to put water in the must in order that the pipes shall not clog. Now, then, in connection with one of the amendments referred to, an amendment to permit not only grape brandy to be added in fortifying, as can be done under existing law—not a provision created by this bill, but existing law—but also the brandy from other fruits, it seemed to us that that would change the character of the product. It would not be a grape product any more if fortified with peach brandy or apple brandy or something else. It would destroy at least the flavor, and a thing would be put upon the market as wine that was not altogether the product of the grape. Wine is the product of the grape. If grape juice was to be fortified with anything it should be with grape brandy. Mr. Speaker, the other provision in this bill makes the wineries pay the cost of the inspection which becomes necessary upon the part of the Government, because, of course, a man might, under the pretense of putting water in his must, put something else besides water in it. This necessitates some additional expense upon the part of the Government in order to see that this privilege of putting water in shall not be abused in that way. To obviate the objection that this would put an expense upon the people and the Government the bill provides that the wineries shall pay the tax stated, which will more than cover the expense.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Missouri intend to use the rest of his time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need trouble the House but a little while. In 1880 Congress allowed brandy to be used free of tax in fortifying sweet wine, and since that time the industry has grown tremendously, so that now we use three million and a half gallons of brandy, roughly speaking, to fortify the wines of the United States. A great portion is used in California, some in New York, some in Ohio, and some in Missouri, and it turns out that this wise provision of the law has captured nearly the whole American market for sweet wines, so that only a trifle is imported, and the great mass of sweet wine consumed in this country is made here. But it turned out that the must in some localities in some seasons, when the summer was hot and the grapes ripened early, contained so much saccharine matter that the manufacturers could not pass it through the pipes without the addition of water, and I suspect that some of them have been violating the law, because they must have the water in the must in order to get it through the pipes. When the Commissioner found this out he went after them, and the result was the concoction of this law. All the sweet-wine producers in the United States, including Missouri—perhaps I ought to say "and Missouri"—unite in the provisions of the law in order to meet a mechanical necessity in the manufacture of the wine. Now, if they were allowed to use any amount of water in their own sweet will in fortifying this must and used the brandy to fortify the grape juice, it might turn out simply a subterfuge with enough grape juice put in to evade the law and 90 per cent or 50 per cent of water and the balance of alcohol, furnishing a very cheap drink with free alcohol. To guard against this, these strenuous provisions are put into this bill, and in order to make the thing exactly equitable it is also provided that there shall be a tax of 3 cents a gallon put upon the spirits fortifying the wine in order to raise enough money to pay the expenses of the administration. We also regulate in the bill the amount of sugar that may go into the wine—not exceeding 10 per cent.

Mr. KAHN. At the present time the Government of the United States pays that expense; is not that a fact?

Mr. PAYNE. It has ever since the law was enacted, but these other provisions are so widely extended and the expense has been so much that it was thought just on the part of the Commissioner of the Revenue and the Treasury Department that this tax should go on, in order that the wine makers should pay at least a part of the expense that will come up in the future that the Government has stood in the past. Now, our friend from Missouri comes in here and talks about the pure-food bill. That has no relation to this question. It is simply admitting sugar into the must before it is fermented in order to increase the amount of alcohol or spirit brandy in the must to fortify the wines, so they will keep and be preserved until they are ready to be used.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We have legislated here to allow these California people to put water into the grape juice simply to facilitate getting it through the pipes. What reasonable objection can there be to permitting somebody else who is a manufacturer of wine to add water after fermentation for the purpose of facilitating economical distillation? It looks like one thing is as fair as the other, and if you had let me put that amendment in, and seven others, I would not have objected.

Mr. PAYNE (reading)—

SEC. 43. That the wine spirits mentioned in section 42 of this act is the product resulting from the distillation of fermented grape juice, to which water may have been added prior to, during, or after fermentation for the sole purpose of facilitating, etc.

The only limit is there shall not be put exceeding 10 per cent of it, and it can be put in afterwards, as the gentleman would like to amend the bill now. The gentleman from Missouri is crying for more water, as I understand it, in this wine. The difficulty with that is it opens the way for evasion of the internal revenue laws of the country. These men simply use water to tone down the spirits that are put into it to make a convenient drink which is not wine and bears a resemblance to whisky. The gentleman wants to put rock into it. I understand rock goes very well with rye in Missouri, but I never heard before they needed it in the manufacture of wine. The gentleman wants to put molasses in it. Why not take pure sugar, as the bill provides, from cane or beet sugar?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If one sweet thing is good to go into it why not another?

Mr. PAYNE. Of course, you might go on with the whole list and enumerate them, but it is sufficient to put in the sugar. Sugar is pure and the best thing to go in. The grape growers want to use it, the wine makers want to use it, so why go out of our way and conjure up something else like rock candy and molasses?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Rock and rye is one of the most seductive tipples on earth.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman knows molasses is impure, and he wants to get some impurity into this wine. We are after pure sugar, and that is the reason the bill is made up as it is.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK of Missouri) there were—ayes 111, noes 17.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman shouting "No quorum!" raises no question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point, then, there is no quorum present.

Mr. PAYNE. That is different.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did it the way it is generally done—ninety-nine times out of a hundred.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Sergeant-at-Arms will close the doors and bring in absentees. The question is on suspending the rules, agreeing to the amendments, and passing the bill. As many as are in favor of the motion will, as their names are called, answer "aye," as many as are opposed will answer "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 185, nays 34, answered "present" 12, not voting 151, as follows:

APPOINTMENTS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 5276, as amended by the Naval Committee. It relates to the appointments at Annapolis.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5276) relating to appointments to the Naval Academy, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1514 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act of July 26, 1894, is hereby amended to read, on and after June 1, 1906, as follows: "The Secretary of the Navy shall, as soon as possible after the 1st day of June of each year preceding the final graduation of midshipmen in the succeeding year, notify in writing each Senator and each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives of any vacancy that will exist at the Naval Academy because of such graduation, and which he shall be entitled to fill by nomination of a candidate and one or more alternates therefor. The nomination of a candidate and alternate or alternates to fill said vacancy shall be made upon the recommendation of the Senator, Member, or Delegate, if such recommendation is made by the 15th day of August of the year following that in which said notice in writing is given, but if it is not made by that time the Secretary of the Navy shall fill the vacancy by appointment of an actual resident of the State, Congressional district, or Territory, as the case may be, in which the vacancy will exist, who shall have been for at least two years immediately preceding the date of his appointment an actual and bona fide resident of the State, Congressional district, or Territory in which the vacancy will exist and of the legal qualification under the laws as now provided. In cases where by reason of a vacancy in the membership of the Senate or House of Representatives, or by the death or declination of a candidate for admission to the academy there occurs or will occur at the academy a vacancy from any State, district, or Territory that can not be filled by nomination as herein provided, the same may be filled as soon thereafter and before the final entrance examination for the year as the Secretary of the Navy may determine. No candidate or alternate nominated hereunder shall be entitled to any pay or allowance until he shall have been regularly admitted to the Naval Academy. The candidates allowed for the District of Columbia and all the candidates appointed at large, together with alternates therefor, shall be selected by the President within the period herein prescribed for nomination of other candidates."

SEC. 2. That the academic course of midshipmen at the Naval Academy shall hereafter be four years. When midshipmen shall have passed successfully the graduating examination at the academy they shall receive appointments as ensigns, and shall take rank according to their proficiency as shown by the order of their merit at the date of graduation.

SEC. 3. That after the 1st day of July, 1906, all candidates for admission to the Naval Academy at the time of their admission must be between the ages of 16 and 20 years.

SEC. 4. That civilian professors and instructors, after ten years of continuous service, be provided with quarters or commutation therefor as now allowed to a lieutenant-commander of the Navy; that all professors and instructors have the privilege of purchasing coal and wood at Government rates.

SEC. 5. That there shall be appointed during the year 1906, in the following manner, a Board of Visitors to attend the annual examination of the Naval Academy: Seven persons shall be appointed by the President, two of whom shall serve for one year each, two for two years each, and three for three years each; one Senator to serve for one year and one Senator to serve for two years, and three Members of the House of Representatives, one to serve one year, one to serve two years, and one to serve three years; said Senators and Representatives to be designated by the Vice-President or the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, at the session of Congress next preceding such examination and annually thereafter, at the expiration of the terms of service of persons appointed hereunder, successors shall be appointed to serve for periods of three years each. Vacancies occurring in the membership of said board because of termination of terms of service in the Senate or House of Representatives of members of those bodies, and all vacancies occurring from any other cause, shall be filled by appointment for the unexpired terms, respectively. Each member of said board shall receive not exceeding 8 cents per mile traveled by the most direct route from his residence to Annapolis, and 8 cents per mile for each mile from said place to his residence on returning and $5 per diem for expenses during actual attendance at the academy.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, is this a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear an explanation of that bill, as I could not hear the Clerk.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to explain the bill to my friend from Texas. It embodies some recommendations that have been made by the Board of Visitors at Annapolis during a good many years past. Last year the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE, now Senator BRANDEGEE], and myself were the Board of Visitors. We spent a week at Annapolis, and made some recommendations, which I was requested to bring before the House. The principal changes made in the present law are two or three in number. First, a midshipman is required to be appointed about a year in advance of the vacancy, the same as is now done at West Point. This is to give him an opportunity to study up for his entrance examination.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In that connection I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If I understand the bill correctly, all the appointments must be made there in about eight weeks, between the 1st of June and the 1st of August.

Mr. VREELAND. About ten weeks' notice, unless there is a vacancy in the office of Representative.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And no notice in anticipation of that to be given to the Members and Senators?

Mr. VREELAND. About ten weeks.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, it might happen that the Member might be inaccessible to the mails, or out of the country, and you say no advance notice is provided for?

Mr. VREELAND. The law is the same as has existed since 1836 at West Point, and that we have been working under all these years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. We have much more time than that for the appointment of military cadets.

Mr. VREELAND. It is the same as the West Point law at present, as I understand it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. We are notified about the 4th of March, and we have from the 4th of March until about the 1st of June.

Mr. VREELAND. I have no doubt that the same practice would prevail in the present instance. I assume it is not required by law. I do not understand the provision at West Point is required by law, but the Secretary of War has this preliminary notice sent to Members that a vacancy is about to exist. I assume the same practice would be followed here. I assume that the procedure of the Secretary of War in reference to the Military Academy was based upon law. It is desirable to have this advance notice given, and possibly the gentleman is right about it, but I think he will find a regulation of the War Department or a practice which they follow to give ample preliminary notice.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My colleague from Virginia says that we have virtually eight months' notice at the Military Academy of appointments.

Mr. VREELAND. There is no object for anyone to fix a time in which an appointment can be made. That would not be pleasant to the Representative, because he is obliged in any event to appoint from his district an actual resident of the district.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in that connection. Why is the law changed?

Mr. VREELAND. The gentleman from Texas, I do not think, has concluded yet.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In a moment, Mr. Speaker, it would be no practical gratification to a Member to know that the Secretary of the Navy will appoint some one from his district, when he takes from the Representative the privilege he has heretofore exercised, and which all value.

Mr. VREELAND. I was assigning that as the reason why the Secretary of the Navy would not be endeavoring to take any advantage in the appointment of midshipmen.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Suppose a Member were out of the country for those ten weeks?

Mr. VREELAND. I assume that if a Member is absent from the country some one is left to attend to his mail.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But not some one with authority to select and nominate a midshipman.

Mr. VREELAND. I suggest to my friend from Texas that we ought to give a little attention to the benefit of the academy, and that if a Member goes away without leaving anyone to attend to public matters which are in his charge, I think that he ought to lose the appointment, although I have not the slightest question but that it would be held open for him until his return.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I have paid considerable attention to the welfare of the academy, and I am proud to say that all the young men I have appointed have graduated quite near the top.

Mr. LACEY. In the bill which I have in my hand I see, in line 14, page 3, the ages are from 16 to 19 years. At present I believe it is from 15 to 20. Why is this change made?

Mr. VREELAND. There has been no change made. The bill as read from the desk leaves it from 16 to 20.

Mr. LACEY. Is it not 15 to 20 now?

Mr. VREELAND. No. No change is made in that respect.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, this law provides that if the appointment shall not be made by the 15th of August the Secretary shall make it.

Mr. VREELAND. Shall make it from the Member's district.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Suppose a Member of Congress makes an appointment within the time and the appointee fails to pass the necessary examination?

Mr. VREELAND. The gentleman will find that is provided for farther on in the section. He has the right in case of the death of the appointee or his failure to pass the examination, just the same as at West Point, to fill the vacancy again.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Representative can appoint somebody to take his place?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to interpose an objection, but this changes the whole plan of appointment to the Naval Academy, and I confess that I did not know this bill was likely to be brought before the body. I should like to have time to study it.

Mr. VREELAND. I hope the gentleman will not object. I want to suggest to him an additional fact. Under the present law at Annapolis 30 per cent of all the men that we appoint and send down there fail in their examinations. At West Point, with the chance of study for a year, practically 100 per cent of these young men are able to obtain admission.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If Members would exercise proper care in the selection of appointees, I do not think there would be the trouble that the gentleman complains of.

Mr. VREELAND. The result is that we are maintaining a school at great expense at Annapolis and only 70 per cent of the boys who ought to be there are admitted on account of lack of time for preparation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I must object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I demand a second.

Mr. VREELAND. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, before that is disposed of, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he will allow an amendment to the date there, the 15th of August?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Alabama to twenty minutes.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an amendment be considered as pending——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. VREELAND. I yield to the gentleman for half a minute.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He was asking something and I did not intend to interrupt him.

Mr. VREELAND. I ask unanimous consent that an amendment be added to the bill, on page 1, line 6, that August 1 be changed to April 1, in order to provide for a longer notice.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the time the gentleman asks for?

Mr. VREELAND. I ask that the time of notifying the members be changed from August 1 to April 1.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, let the amendment be reported.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I understand the only objection on the part of the gentleman who objected is as to the time of notice in section 1. In order to meet that objection I ask unanimous consent that the bill be amended, on page 2, line 5, by striking out the word "August" and inserting the word "April," and add the words "the year following."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 4, strike out the word "August" and insert the word "April;" and after the word "year," insert "following;" so as to read "the 15th day of April of the year following that in which said notice in writing is given."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York in regard to section 4. I notice that the report states that section 4 provides that civilian professors and instructors, after ten years of more continued service, shall be provided with commutation as now allowed to a lieutenant-commander in the Navy. In section 4 of the bill nothing is said about ten years of service.

Mr. VREELAND. I will say that that was owing to the neglect of the clerk of the Naval Committee to have the committee amendments inserted in the reprint of the bill, but I have inserted the amendments in the bill and they were so read in the bill.

Mr. RIXEY. I understand the gentleman from New York proposed to amend this section.

Mr. VREELAND. It was proposed to amend it, and the amendments were in the bill as read from the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the amendments?

Mr. RIXEY. The reason I wanted to know in regard to section 4 was that unless it was amended I should object to this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. VREELAND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to call the gentleman's attention to line 13, page 3, in the printed bill. It reads "examinations." The committee recommended that that be stricken out and the word "admission" inserted. That was a committee amendment.

Mr. VREELAND. I think the bill reads "admission."

Mr. PADGETT. No; it reads "examinations."

Mr. VREELAND. That was a committee amendment, which should have gone in, and I ask unanimous consent that on page 3, line 13, the word "examinations" be changed to "admission."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have accepted these amendments of the several items, and my understanding is that this removes the objection which the gentleman had to the bill, and I ask that a vote be taken.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to state that with the exception of the amendments that have been made the law will provide for the same methods of appointment in every other respect that the existing law does?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes; there is no other change.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then I have no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I want two or three minutes.

Mr. VREELAND. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to this bill to the extent of demanding a vote. At the same time there are some features that I do not indorse or approve. One is the section to which I have called the attention of the gentleman from New York, and another is that the civilian professors and instructors are provided with quarters or commutation thereof as now allowed officers performing a like service. While the section has been amended by providing that civilian professors and instructors must have ten years of service before they have the quarters or commutation therefor now allowed to naval officers performing like service, I think the provision is still objectionable. I do not like this way of legislating for the pay of civilian professors at the academy. This bill does not carry or state what is the compensation of these professors; that provision is carried in the naval appropriation bill. If quarters are to be provided provision should be made in the general appropriation bill and not by this special bill. The effect of this provision is if the Department directed that a rear-admiral should be one of the professors of mathematics at the academy, the civilian professors of mathematics would get the commutation for quarters that a rear-admiral got.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. RIXEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MEYER. Is it not a fact that the committee amendment to that provision provided that civilian instructors mentioned shall have the same rate of commutation of quarters and allowances as a naval officer with the rank of lieutenant-commander?

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I had overlooked that fact, and the gentleman from Louisiana is right. The amendment is not printed with the bill and therefore it was overlooked. He would have commutation for quarters which a lieutenant-commander would get. My objection to this bill is that these quarters or commutation therefor should be provided for, if at all, in the naval appropriation bill, which takes care of the Naval Academy. That is my view of the matter. I am not going to oppose the bill to the extent of demanding a vote. I simply wanted to express my dissent to this provision.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the bill, which I will state here was reported unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the exception of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY].

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

FORFEITURE OF RIGHTS OF WAY THROUGH PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15513) to declare and enforce the forfeiture provided by section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That each and every grant of right of way and station grounds heretofore made to any railroad corporation under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," where such railroad has not been constructed and the period of five years next following the location of said road, or any section thereof, has now expired, shall be, and hereby is, declared forfeited to the United States, to the extent of any portion of such located line now remaining unconstructed, and the United States hereby resumes the full title to the lands covered thereby freed and discharged from such easement, and the forfeiture hereby declared shall, without need of further assurance or conveyance, inure to the benefit of any owner or owners of land heretofore conveyed by the United States subject to any such grant of right of way or station grounds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to offer the following amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following: "Provided, That in any case under this act where construction of the railroad is progressing at the time of the approval of this act the forfeiture declared in this act shall not take effect as to such line of railroad for one year after such approval."

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. WALDO. I would like to know the purpose of this bill, reserving the right to object.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to object. Unanimous consent has already been given.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman will not have any objection after I make the explanation. In 1875 what was known as the "right-of-way act" was passed, giving to railway companies the right to build their roads across the public domain upon the filing of plats, having those plats approved by the Department of the Interior. Some of these plats were filed more than thirty years ago. No roads have been built upon a large number of them. It is proposed now by this bill to declare a forfeiture of all of those old rights of way that have been thus unused for a period of more than five years previous to the passage of this act. While the time of using the right of way was limited in the original act to five years, the courts held that there must either be a judicial or a legislative declaration of forfeiture in order to terminate the rights under grants of this character. Consequently the Department has asked the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill to declare forfeiture of all those old grants so as to clear the calendar of the Interior Department. After reporting the bill, however, we ascertained that there was one road whose rights are over five years' old that has now commenced the process of construction, and the amendment offered is to give an additional year to any roads that are now being constructed before the forfeiture will take effect. There are a good many of these old plats, and they interfere with the filing of new ones. When a new railroad scheme comes up they are sometimes confronted with an old plat twenty-five or thirty years of age, and attempt is made to sell out to them. These old grants ought all to be declared forfeited.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Iowa what time would be given a road that is now in process of construction?

Mr. LACEY. One year.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. One year for what?

Mr. LACEY. To finish the road. We know of only one case where one of these old plats has recently been attempted to be built upon.

Mr. HOGG. The reason I ask is that the Moffatt road is using an old right of way.

Mr. LACEY. They would have a year to finish it.

Mr. HOGG. But it can not be built in one year. I would like to have that amendment amended so as to make it three years instead of one year.

Mr. LACEY. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by inserting the word "three" in place of the word "one."

Mr. LACEY. The reason the committee put it in at one year was because the only company we know of under those circumstances said that one year would be ample. There is no objection to making it three years.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "one" and inserting the word "three;" so as to read "for three years after such approval."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INSPECTORS OF HULLS AND BOILERS.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4360.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and pending that request I desire to make this statement to the House.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent a statement can be made, but it seems to the Chair that all bills ought to be read.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the request in this case because this bill is almost an exact reprint of the existing statute, and I can state to Members in a word or two the only respects in which any change whatever is made.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he move to suspend the rules, and then time will not be wasted. For that purpose I object now.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 4360.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4360) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4414. There shall be in each of the following collection districts, namely, the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Cal.; New London, Conn.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Bangor, Me.; New Haven, Conn.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Willamette, Oreg.; Puget Sound, Wash.; Savannah, Ga.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Oswego, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Duluth, Minn.; Superior, Mich.; Apalachicola, Fla.; Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Providence, R. I., and in each of the following ports, New York, N. Y.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Portland, Me.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Toledo, Ohio; Norfolk, Va.; Evansville, Ind.; Dubuque, Iowa; Louisville, Ky.; Albany, N. Y.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo.; Port Huron, Mich.; New Orleans, La.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; and Burlington, Vt., one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers.

"The inspectors of hulls and the inspectors of boilers in the districts and ports enumerated in the preceding paragraph shall be entitled to the following salaries, to be paid under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, namely:

"For the port of New York, N. Y., at the rate of $2,500 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; San Francisco, Cal., and Puget Sound, Wash., and the ports of Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y., and New Orleans, La., at the rate of $2,250 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Duluth, Minn.; Providence, R. I.; Chicago, Ill., and the ports of Albany, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Portland, Me.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska, and Norfolk, Va., at the rate of $2,000 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Oswego, N. Y.; Willamette, Oreg.; Detroit, Mich., and Mobile, Ala., and the ports of St. Louis, Mo., and Port Huron, Mich., at the rate of $1,800 per year for each local inspector.

"For the districts of Pittsburg, Pa.; New Haven, Conn.; Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, S. C.; Galveston, Tex.; New London, Conn.; Superior, Mich.; Bangor, Me., and Apalachicola, Fla., and the ports of Dubuque, Iowa; Toledo, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; Burlington, Vt.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Louisville, Ky., and Cincinnati, Ohio, at the rate of $1,500 per year for each local inspector.

"And in addition the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may appoint, in districts or ports where there are 225 steamers and upward to be inspected annually, assistant inspectors, at a salary, for the port of New York, of $2,000 a year each; for the port of New Orleans, La.; the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; the ports of Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill., and the district of San Francisco, Cal., at $1,800 per year each, and for all other districts and ports at a salary not exceeding $1,600 a year each; and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,000 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid his actual and reasonable traveling expenses or mileage, at the rate of 5 cents a mile, incurred in the performance of his duties, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

"Assistant inspectors, appointed as provided by law, shall perform such duties of actual inspection as may be assigned to them under the direction, supervision, and control of the local inspectors.

"And the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may from time to time detail said assistant inspectors of one port or district for service in any other port or district as the needs of the Steamboat-Inspection Service may, in his discretion, require, and the actual and reasonable traveling expenses or mileage of assistant inspectors so detailed shall, subject to such limitations as the said Secretary may in his discretion prescribe, be paid in the same manner as provided in this section for inspectors."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of May, 1906.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to demand a second, I should like——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second, in order to save time.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from West Virginia is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Indiana to twenty minutes.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this bill amends section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which relates to inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels. Notwithstanding the fact that so many places are mentioned in this bill, the present bill is an exact reprint of the existing law, with the exception of three changes which I will now specify to the House. In the first place, at the request of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, a new inspection district was created at St. Michael, in Alaska. St. Michael is a point southwest of the southern end of Bering Strait, and is, perhaps, as much as 2,000 miles from Juneau, the only other station or post of this sort in Alaska. In addition to that, this bill proposes to abolish two inspection districts on the Ohio River, namely, the one at Gallipolis and one at Wheeling, W. Va., and to establish, for convenience and economy and for the interest of the public service, one district in the place of those two at Point Pleasant, W. Va. Those are two of the changes made. No other places where there are such officers are affected in any way whatever. Now, there is one more change in the existing act, and that is the only other one. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor is authorized to pay $1,600 annually instead of $1,200 to some clerks to inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels; and my information is—and I think I can assure the House that that is correct—that not more than four or five clerks can possibly be affected by this change; so that while the bill is long, because it repeats all the existing law as to the inspection districts already provided for, because of the inconvenience in point of language in expressing the changes intended in any other way, the changes are exceedingly few and very brief and in the interest of economy and the public service. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania with pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. How many of these inspectors are there in the United States?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many inspectors there are in the United States. This bill makes so little change in existing law; this is so little in the nature of a complete act with reference to these inspectors, I have not given it any consideration.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Then, as I understand the gentleman from West Virginia, there is no change except in these three particulars?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Only in the three particulars that I have named.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The other districts are not in any way disturbed or interfered with.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The other districts are in no way disturbed by this act.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from West Virginia to line 17, page 3, where it speaks of the district of Superior, Mich. If that is an exact copy of the law, I may be mistaken with reference to it. Superior is not in Michigan, but in Wisconsin, and I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the apparent mistake. The word "district" may have relation to something else.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What is the line?

Mr. JENKINS. Line 17. I do not know what is meant by the term "district," or what that is intended to include. On line 17, page 3, it speaks of district, Superior, Mich.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, while I may be unable to explain just what that means in the law, I have the law here and have verified my statement, that the bill is in the language of the Revised Statutes to-day. I have my finger here on the place, if the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to look at it. I suggest to him that the service has been satisfactorily administered under the existing language, and the apparent objection that occurs to the gentleman from Wisconsin is probably not well founded.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that Superior is not in Michigan.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I am perfectly willing to admit that.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from West Virginia is in charge of the bill, and I take it he can furnish the House with the necessary information, so that Members may be informed. I want to know what is included in the term "district" as applying to Superior, Mich.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JENKINS. I am satisfied. If the gentleman can not answer the question, I can not answer it myself.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I would suggest that if a correction is needed it can be made hereafter somewhere.

Mr. JENKINS. I do not know just what this reference is—district Superior, Mich.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it means the district of Lake Superior contiguous to Michigan.

Mr. JENKINS. Possibly.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I do not know further than I have already explained. It is exactly the language under which the service has adequately been carried on.

Mr. JENKINS. I do not know what it is, and I wanted to know, and the gentleman is not able to inform me.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, if there is no Member of the House who desires to speak against this bill, I will reserve the balance of my time. I do not care to occupy any time against the bill.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 10501 as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules, agree to the amendments, and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10501) to incorporate the National Education Association of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-named persons, who are now the officers and directors and trustees of the National Educational Association, a corporation organized in the year 1886, under the act of general incorporation of the revised statutes of the District of Columbia, namely: Nathan C. Schaeffer, Eliphalet Oram Lyte, John W. Langsinger, of Pennsylvania; Isaac W. Hill, of Alabama; Arthur J. Matthews, of Arizona; John H. Hinemon, George B. Cook, of Arkansas; Joseph O'Connor, Josiah L. Pickard, Arthur H. Chamberlain, of California; Aaron Gove, Ezekiel H. Cook, Lewis C. Greenlee, of Colorado; Charles H. Keyes, of Connecticut; George W. Twitmyer, of Delaware; J. Ormond Wilson, William T. Harris, Alexander T. Stuart, of the District of Columbia; Clem Hampton, of Florida; William M. Slaton, of Georgia; Frances Mann, of Idaho; J. Joseph A. Mercer, of Illinois; Nebraska Cropsey, Thomas A. Mott, of Indiana; John D. Benedict, of Indian Territory; John F. Riggs, Ashley V. Storm, of Iowa; John W. Spindler, Jasper N. Wilkinson, A. V. Jewett, Luther D. Whittemore, of Kansas; William Henry Bartholomew, of Kentucky; Warren Easton, of Louisiana; John S. Locke, of Maine; M. Bates Stephens, of Maryland; Charles W. Eliot, Mary H. Hunt, Henry T. Bailey, of Massachusetts; Hugh A. Graham, Charles G. White, William H. Elson, of Michigan; William F. Phelps, Irwin Shepard, John A. Cranston, of Minnesota; Robert B. Fulton, of Mississippi; F. Louis Soldan, James M. Greenwood, William J. Hawkins, of Missouri; Oscar J. Craig, of Montana; George L. Towne, of Nebraska; Joseph E. Stubbs, of Nevada; James E. Klock, of New Hampshire; James M. Green, John Enright, of New Jersey; Charles M. Light, of New Mexico; James H. Canfield, Nicholas Murray Butler, William H. Maxwell, Charles R. Skinner, Albert P. Marble, James C. Byrnes, of New York; James Y. Joyner, Julius Isaac Foust, of North Carolina; Fitt Gordon Knowlton, of North Dakota; Oscar T. Corson, Jacob A. Shawan, Wells L. Griswold, of Ohio; Edgar S. Vaught, Andrew R. Hickam, of Oklahoma; Charles Carroll Stratton, Edwin D. Beisler, of Oregon; Thomas W. Bicknell, Walter Ballou Jacobs, of Rhode Island; David B. Johnson, Robert P. Peil, of South Carolina; Moritz Adelbert Lange, of South Dakota; Eugene F. Turner, of Tennessee; Lloyd E. Wolfe, of Texas; David H. Christensen, of Utah; Henry O. Wheeler, Isaac Thomas, of Vermont; Joseph L. Jarman, of Virginia; Edward T. Mathes, of Washington; T. Marcellus Marshall, Lucy Robinson, of West Virginia; Lorenzo D. Harvey, of Wisconsin; Thomas T. Tynan, of Wyoming; Cassia Patton, of Alaska; Frank H. Ball, of Porto Rico; Arthur F. Griffiths, of Hawaii; C. H. Maxson, of the Philippine Islands, and such other persons as now are or may hereafter be associated with them as officers or members of said association, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of the "National Education Association of the United States," and by that name shall be known and have perpetual succession with the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

SEC. 2. That the purpose and object of the said corporation shall be to elevate the character and advance the interests of the profession of teaching, and to promote the cause of education in the United States. This corporation shall include the National Council of Education and the following departments, and such others as may hereafter be created by organization or consolidation, to wit: The departments, first, of superintendence; second, of normal schools; third, of elementary education; fourth, of higher education; fifth, of manual training; sixth, of art education; seventh, of kindergarten education; eighth, of music education; ninth, of secondary education; tenth, of business education; eleventh, of child study; twelfth, of physical education; thirteenth, of natural science instruction; fourteenth, of school administration; fifteenth, the library department; sixteenth, of special education; seventeenth, of Indian education; the powers and duties and the number and names of these departments and of the National Council of Education may be changed or abolished at the pleasure of the corporation as provided in its by-laws.

SEC. 3. That the said corporation shall further have power to have and to use a common seal and to alter and change the same at its pleasure; to sue or to be sued in any court of the United States, or other court of competent jurisdiction; to make by-laws not inconsistent with the provisions of this act or of the Constitution of the United States; to take or receive, whether by gift, grant, devise, bequest, or purchase, any real or personal estate, and to hold, grant, convey, hire, or lease the same for the purposes of its incorporation, and to accept and administer any trust of real or personal estate for any educational purpose within the objects of the corporation.

SEC. 4. That all real property of the corporation within the District of Columbia, which shall be used by the corporation for the educational or other purposes of the corporation as aforesaid, other than the purposes of producing income, and all personal property and funds of the corporation held, used, or invested for educational purposes aforesaid, or to produce income to be used for such purposes, shall be exempt from taxation: Provided, however, That this exemption shall not apply to any property of the corporation which shall not be used for or the income of which shall not be applied to the educational purposes of the corporation: And provided further, That the corporation shall annually file with the Commissioner of Education of the United States a report in writing stating in detail the property, real and personal, held by the corporation, and the expenditure or other use or disposition of the same, or the income thereof, during the preceding year.

SEC. 5. That the membership of the said corporation shall consist of three classes of members—namely, active, associate, and corresponding—whose qualifications, terms of membership, rights, and obligations shall be prescribed by the by-laws of the corporation.

SEC. 6. That the officers of the said corporation shall be a president, twelve vice-presidents, a secretary, a treasurer, a board of directors, an executive committee, and a board of trustees.

The board of directors shall consist of a president, the first vice-president, the secretary, the treasurer, the chairman of the board of trustees, and one additional member from each State, Territory, or District, to be elected by the active members for the term of one year, or until their successors are chosen, and of all life directors of the National Educational Association. The United States Commissioner of Education, and all former presidents of the said association now living, and all future presidents of the association hereby incorporated, at the close of their respective terms of office, shall be members of the board of directors for life. The board of directors shall have power to fill all vacancies in their own body; shall have in charge the general interests of the corporation, excepting those herein intrusted to the board of trustees, and shall possess such other powers as shall be conferred upon them by the by-laws of the corporation.

The executive committee shall consist of five members, as follows: The president of the association, the first vice-president, the treasurer, the chairman of the board of trustees, and a member of the association, to be chosen annually by the board of directors, to serve one year. The said committee shall have authority to represent and to act for the board of directors in the intervals between the meetings of that body, to the extent of carrying out the legislation adopted by the board of directors under general directions as may be given by said board.

The board of trustees shall consist of four members, elected by the board of directors for the term of four years, and the president of the association, who shall be a member ex officio during his term of office. At the first meeting of the board of directors, held during the annual meeting of the association at which they were elected, they shall elect one trustee for the term of four years. All vacancies occurring in said board of trustees, whether by resignation or otherwise, shall be filled by the board of directors for the unexpired term; and the absence of a trustee from two successive annual meetings of the board shall forfeit his membership.

SEC. 7. That the invested fund now known as the "Permanent fund of the National Educational Association," when transferred to the corporation hereby created, shall be held by such corporation as a permanent fund and shall be in charge of the board of trustees, who shall provide for the safe-keeping and investment of such fund, and of all other funds which the corporation may receive by donation, bequest, or devise. No part of the principal of such permanent fund or its accretions shall be expended, except by a two-thirds vote of the active members of the association, present at any annual meeting, upon the recommendation of the board of trustees, after such recommendation has been approved by vote of the board of directors, and after printed notice of the proposed expenditure has been mailed to all active members of the association. The income of the permanent fund shall be used only to meet the cost of maintaining the organization of the association and of publishing its annual volume of proceedings, unless the terms of the donation, bequest, or devise shall otherwise specify, or the board of directors shall otherwise order. It shall also be the duty of the board of trustees to issue orders on the treasurer for the payment of all bills approved by the board of directors, or by the president and secretary of the association acting under the authority of the board of directors. When practicable, the board of trustees shall invest, as part of the permanent fund, all surplus funds exceeding $500 that shall remain in the hands of the treasurer after paying the expenses of the association for the previous year, and providing for the fixed expenses and for all appropriations made by the board of directors for the ensuing year.

The board of trustees shall elect the secretary of the association, who shall also be secretary of the executive committee, and shall fix the compensation and the term of his office for the period not to exceed four years.

SEC. 8. That the principal office of the said corporation shall be in the city of Washington, D. C.: Provided, That the meetings of the corporation, its officers, committees, and departments, may be held, and that its business may be transacted and an office or offices may be maintained elsewhere within the United States, as may be determined by the board of directors, or otherwise, in accordance with the by-laws.

SEC. 9. That the charter, constitution, and by-laws of the National Educational Association shall continue in full force and effect until the charter granted by this act shall be accepted by such association at the next annual meeting of the association and until new by-laws shall be adopted, and that the present officers, directors, and trustees of said association shall continue to hold office and perform their respective duties as such until the expiration of the terms for which they were severally elected or appointed, and until their successors are elected. That at such annual meeting the active members of the National Educational Association then present may organize and proceed to accept the charter granted by this act and adopt by-laws, to elect officers to succeed those whose terms have expired or are about to expire, and generally organize the "National Education Association of the United States," and that the board of trustees of the corporation hereby incorporated shall thereupon, if the charter granted by this act shall be accepted, receive, take over, and enter into possession, custody, and management of all property, real and personal, of the corporation heretofore known as the National Educational Association, incorporated as aforesaid under the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, and all its rights, contracts, claims, and property of every kind and nature whatsoever; and the several officers, directors, and trustees of such last-named association, or any other person having charge of any of the securities, funds, books, or property thereof, real or personal, shall on demand deliver the same to the proper officers, directors, or trustees of the corporation hereby created: Provided, That a verified certificate executed by the presiding officer and secretary of such annual meeting, showing the acceptance of the charter granted by this act by the National Educational Association shall be legal evidence of the fact, when filed with the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That in the event of the failure of the association to accept the charter granted by this act at said annual meeting, then the charter of the National Educational Association and its corporate existence shall be, and are hereby, extended until the 1st day of July, 1907, and at any time before said date its charter may be extended in the manner and form provided by the general corporation law of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 10. That the rights of creditors of the said existing corporation, known as the National Educational Association, shall not in any manner be impaired by the passage of this act, or the transfer of the property heretofore mentioned, nor shall any liability or obligation, or the payment of any sum due or to become due, or any claim or demand, in any manner, or for any cause existing against the said existing corporation, be released or impaired; and the corporation hereby incorporated is declared to succeed to the obligations and liabilities, and to be held liable to pay and discharge all of the debts, liabilities, and contracts of the said corporation so existing, to the same effect as if such new corporation had itself incurred the obligation or liability to pay such debt or damages, and no action or proceeding before any court or tribunal shall be deemed to have abated or been discontinued by reason of this act.

SEC. 11. That Congress may from time to time alter, repeal, or modify this act of incorporation, but no contract or individual right made or acquired shall thereby be divested or impaired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is intended to incorporate the National Education Association of the United States, and thereby change the title of the National Educational Association of the District of Columbia, the present title of the association. In other words, the primary object of the bill is to give the association a national title which will comport with its real character, inasmuch as the association embraces the forty-five States of the Union in its membership. That is the principal object of the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do you say that this association is already incorporated?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. It is already incorporated in the District of Columbia, under the law of the District of Columbia, as the National Educational Association of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the charter expired last February.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What changes are made in this proposed law from the old law? Will you be kind enough to inform us?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. The association has already been incorporated in the District of Columbia, and this bill is intended to give it a national title by act of Congress. Instead of being the National Educational Association of the District of Columbia, it will be known as the "National Educational Association of the United States."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is the only change between the old law and the proposed law?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. That is the only change, in this respect.

Mr. McCALL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order; I would like to know what is going on over there.

Mr. McCALL. I would like to inquire whether this act or bill is not favored by the leading educators of the United States?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. The bill is certainly favored by the leading educators of the United States.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I rise to ask for order, so that we may be able to know the question which the gentleman from Massachusetts has propounded. I would like to hear.

The SPEAKER. The House is in exceptionally good order.

Mr. McCALL. I inquired of the gentleman whether this legislation was not favored by the leading educators of the United States, and I understood him to say it was; and I wish to add that I have received a letter from President Eliot, of Harvard University, in which he expresses himself as strongly in favor of this bill.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I would state, for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the Committee on Education has received hundreds of letters and telegrams from all sections of the Union in favor of this bill, and that but a single discordant note has been heard, and that on the part of one lady from Chicago, who insisted on appearing before the committee and being heard. The committee gave the lady a full hearing of over two hours; and after having discussed her argument fully, the committee reported this bill unanimously to the House.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. This is a unanimous report?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Does this involve any extension of the powers of the corporation?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. This does not involve any extension of the powers of the association, nor does it involve the Government of the United States in the expenditure of one dollar, directly or indirectly.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will just state, in corroboration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that I have received a number of letters from leading educators in Pennsylvania, especially western Pennsylvania, favoring this bill.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. I dare say that almost every Member of this House has received letters or telegrams from his constituents in favor of this measure.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say this association has been previously incorporated?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Yes; for twenty years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. In the District of Columbia.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under the District laws?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Under the District laws.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do you want to incorporate it by a national law?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. It is proposed to reincorporate it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the matter with the present charter?

A MEMBER. It has expired.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. The purpose is that the association shall be reincorporated in the District of Columbia, but with a national title, in order to make the title of this association comport with its real nature.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why have you changed the name?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. The Committee on Education embraces a great deal of legal talent, but I myself am not a lawyer. During the four days' careful attention which we gave to the subject the room of the Committee on Education reminded me of the Supreme Court of the United States; and in order that the gentleman may be fully answered I will yield five minutes to my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has gotten almost red in the face and seems a little unpleasant about his answers.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. "The gentleman from Tennessee" is a lawyer and is trying to ask some questions about your bill.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Will the gentleman kindly refer his questions to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], who is a lawyer?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will do so.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I fear that several Members are frightened on account of the name of this association. I assure them that there is nothing unusual in this name. If you will look on page 3 of the bill you will find that these men, two from each State, "are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of the 'National Education Association of the United States.'"

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What is the capital stock?

Mr. WEBB. There is no capital stock, not a share of it. It is purely an altruistic institution for the upbuilding of education in the United States. It is in no sense a commercial organization, but devoted entirely to disseminating education.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It has some regulations about contracts and also the right to sue and be sued.

Mr. WEBB. Yes. We could not well incorporate it without granting this power, which every corporation whether State or national has.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And its property is to be exempt from taxation in certain places.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; in the District of Columbia only.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it contemplated to hold property outside of the District of Columbia?

Mr. WEBB. They can hold it by donation or gift.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And wherever they do hold it it is to be absolutely exempt from any State or local taxes?

Mr. WEBB. No; it is only free from taxation in the District of Columbia. We would have no right to attempt to exempt it from taxation elsewhere, and hence we do not in this bill. Its property in each State is subject to the tax laws of the States, but many States do not tax property held for educational purposes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Why could they not become incorporated under the District laws as they now are?

Mr. WEBB. They could.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Under the same name they now have?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I will say for the information of the gentleman from Missouri that it is incorporated now under the laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has twenty minutes of his own, when I have only five. The gentleman from Massachusetts has twenty minutes, and he will make himself clearly understood in that time, I have no doubt.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. What is the caption of this corporation?

Mr. WEBB. The National Education Association of the United States.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Is it authorized to do business outside of the District of Columbia—in other words, is it a District of Columbia corporation, or a corporation intended to operate and be effective beyond the limits of the District of Columbia?

Mr. WEBB. It is a corporation with the same rights and powers and duties as if it were incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia or any State.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then it is authorized to go beyond the confines of the District of Columbia and do business outside of the District?

Mr. WEBB. Most assuredly so. State corporations have this power also. It is a corporation or association of about 2,000 educators from all over the United States.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We have had this question before us, and we have restricted corporations to the District of Columbia; and looking up the precedents we found that that was the uniform practice, except with reference to two or three corporations which had slipped through without discovery.

Mr. WEBB. Congress has passed a bill incorporating the Carnegie Institute, almost on all fours with this, and to incorporate a General Educational Association, almost similar in every respect to this. This was done in the Fifty-eighth Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, we give to this association no more powers than any State would give or the District of Columbia would give. The only addition or advantage that our incorporation here gives is to add the prestige to it of having been incorporated by Congress. It is such a distinguished body of educators, composed of leading men all over the United States and thousands of teachers, it is simply an act of courtesy that Congress should pass this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will that deprive some other association of educators from being incorporated under the same name?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all. Oh, they could not take the same name—that is, the identical name.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly; that is the objection to their taking the words "United States." That is what I am getting at.

Mr. WEBB. Who would want to take the same name? If you should incorporate under the laws of the District of Columbia, it would have the same effect so far as infringing on the name is concerned. No corporation can take another's name from it. You can have the same powers, but not the same name; but this act does not prevent the use of the words "United States" in connection with the name of any other educational organization or association.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why do you not incorporate under the general laws of the District of Columbia?

Mr. WEBB. Why did not the Carnegie Institute incorporate under the general law of the District?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the object of a special charter for this institution?

Mr. WEBB. Nothing except to give the association the added prestige which comes from Congressional incorporation. It is entitled to it. It is composed of educators throughout the United States, and it is a national association in the scope and character of its work and membership.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What special powers are given to them?

Mr. WEBB. None. This body of 2,000 educators met two years ago and asked that this charter be given by this Congress. They want the charter from Congress in order to give them the added prestige.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Wouldn't they get the prestige necessary if they incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia; and wouldn't they stand just as well as any other corporation under the general laws?

Mr. WEBB. They do not think so; they would have the same power, but not the same prestige; and this is the only institution of its kind in America. The incorporators are leading educators from every State in the Union; its membership is composed of teachers in every State.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it too late for me to raise the point of order against this bill, that it has been reported from the wrong committee?

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. It would not be in order for the gentleman to make the point at this time.

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. I yield the gentleman from North Carolina two minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. As I said, Mr. Speaker, this organization is composed of the heads of universities, North and South, East and West, and the heads of other great colleges, and thousands of earnest teachers, and every one of these members, excepting about fifteen, ask this Congress to pass this bill. There is one person, whose name will no doubt appear in this discussion later, who has caused most of the opposition and made the objection to this bill. They want to scare Democrats and mislead Republicans by saying that the name is something that does not sound well, when, actually, there is no more power given in the charter than they could get from New Jersey, or North Carolina, or any other State.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is there not a special power given to acquire and dispose of property?

Mr. WEBB. No. I want to say that the Committee on Education considered this bill patiently for four days and considered it carefully. We amended it where we thought it ought to be amended, and we brought in a unanimous report. The committee heard all this opposition that is made to the bill, and had before it the person who is responsible for the fight that is now being made against the measure.

The bill is almost an exact copy of the charter under which this organization has operated and existed for twenty years, and we provide in this bill that it shall not be effective until the present association shall adopt it at an annual meeting. Can you suggest a fairer provision? Here are some letters from distinguished educators of the South urging the passage of the bill. You have heard from the North. Here is one from the University of Virginia, President Alderman; from the University of North Carolina, President Venable; from the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Raleigh, N. C., Doctor Winston, and a handful of other letters from other teachers and educators. This society is an educational intitution purely national in its scope. All they ask is to give it the prestige of passing a bill for its incorporation by Congress.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, is it subject to amendment—that charter?

Mr. WEBB. Why, certainly. Congress can amend it any time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from North Carolina kindly refer to the provision that authorizes a modification?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why this bill should not pass.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the opposition consume some of its time now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. No.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in ten minutes' debate I have not heard in Congress so much misinformation as I have heard in the last ten minutes. We have been told solemnly by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOUTHWICK] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] that there are no changes in the charter of this corporation from the provisions of the existing charter. Why, Mr. Speaker, if any Member of the House would take the pains to examine the old charter and compare it with this, he would not have the hardihood to get up on this floor and state that there are no changes. We have all received letters concerning this bill and the letters which I received are based upon the ground that the charter should be changed in order to give to the board of trustees complete control over the investment of the permanent fund. There is a change that is admitted by the proponents of the bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely nothing that may be secured by this bill that can not be secured by an amendment of the existing articles of incorporation. The statements made by the gentlemen who are in charge of this bill, though made in good faith no doubt, are misleading in the extreme.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Not just now; later on. Why, I had to smile when the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOUTHWICK] blandly stated that the primary object of this bill was to change the title, to give the association the prestige of the name of the National Education Association of the United States. There was no need to bring a bill before Congress in order to change that title. They could change that title under existing laws.

But let me give the House a little history of this bill. In the first place, there was a movement to prolong the life of the association. It was chartered as a corporation under the laws of the District of Columbia for twenty years. Those twenty years expired on the 26th day of February last. Therefore the members of the association, in meeting assembled, empowered the directors to recommend such changes as were necessary—now, mark the words, "as were necessary"—and for what? To continue the life of the existing association. In the original authorization there was not the delegation of a single power beyond that one—namely, to prolong the life of this association. The bill was brought before this body. It was subjected to the usual delays. The 20th of February passed. The charter was not granted by Congress, and the corporation then did all that it needs for its protection—namely, filed with the District of Columbia a certificate extending their articles of incorporation. They may go on for twenty years longer. They may change their title so as to obtain the title which they have by this act of Congress. They may change their charter if they please. They may change their constitution. They may change their by-laws by calling a meeting of the members of this association in a democratic way and submitting proposed changes to those members and then allowing the majority to rule. But the object of this bill is to prevent a majority from ruling. Who are the members of the National Education Association of the United States? President Eliot alone? President Nicholas Murray Butler alone? Not at all. They are made up of the rank and file of the teachers, male and female, of these United States, those who are charged with the responsible duty of educating the youth of the land. Who puts up the money for this corporation?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Not now. Who puts up the money? The college presidents? Not at all. The teachers of the United States put up practically every dollar that goes into the coffers of this association.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will not yield until later, when I will indicate a readiness to do so. Later on I will yield. Now, the money that furnishes the bone and sinew of the corporation is collected from the dues of the tens of thousands of teachers of the United States. It is true there are donations from philanthropic persons, but they do not make up the bulk of the money that is in the treasury of this corporation. Mr. Speaker, it is now proposed to vest in the board of trustees practically absolute power over the affairs of this corporation. They have practically absolute control over the expenditure of the permanent fund and of the current funds. They are directed to place all surplus funds, except $500 a year, in this permanent fund. The people who compose this association, if this charter goes through, will not have the power to direct the expenditure of one single dollar of the funds to which they contribute. The entire fund is placed in absolute control of the board of directors and the trustees of this national educational trust, for that is just exactly what this is, Mr. Speaker. Now, they say there are no changes. Why, the very body, the principal constituent of this corporation, was the National Council of Education. Now, under the old charter that National Council of Education was a department of the main body, subject to the rules of the main body, subject to the control of the voting members of that body in meeting assembled. This proposed charter takes the National Council of Education out of the control of the national body and practically makes it an independent body. It is no longer under this charter a department of the National Education Association.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In just two or three minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was going to add this: Not only an independent body, but a self-perpetuating body.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Precisely. Now, Mr. Speaker, five hours' argument will not make the proposition plainer that in the hands of these five trustees are to be placed the moneys of the teachers of the United States and the control in a large measure of the progress of education itself in the United States. How may it affect education, some Member may ask? Let me tell you the powers of the national council under this charter. The national council shall have for its object the consideration and discussion of educational questions of public and professional interest. Now, what does that power mean, gentlemen? It means that the discussion of the leading educational questions before the country will be confined practically to the channel which the national council of education prescribes. Now take the next power. It shall also decide suitable subjects for investigation and research and a recommendation of the amount of appropriations that should be made for such purposes. Not only will they determine the scope of the discussion of questions relating to education, but if research must be made they have the power to give or withhold appropriations in the execution of that design. What else? The appointment and general supervision of such special committees of investigation as may be provided for and authorized by the board of trustees of the association, and furthermore the power of disposition of all reports by such special committees of research and the annual preparation and presentation to the association at its annual convention of the report on educational progress during the past year.

What does that mean? The report of a national educational association submitted every year is a guide to the teachers all over these United States for their reading, their discussion, their study in the ensuing year, and this board has absolute power to determine what shall go into that report and what shall not go into that report; what may be discussed at its meetings and what may not be discussed at its meetings; what subjects may be investigated and what subjects shall be excluded from investigation. Now, those are the powers, and the board of trustees, as I have stated, have almost complete power over the disposal of the funds of this association. If any members of that association at its annual meeting would like to have some money, their own money, expended in a particular way, I say to you Members of this House they are powerless to do so under the charter which you propose to thrust upon the teachers of the United States. Oh, I know the teachers are voiceless; they have no heads of colleges to speak for them; they have no presidents of universities to lend the prestige of their great names to influence the judgment and action of Members of this House. They are voiceless because they live on salaries; they are dependent upon the good will of the superintendents of education over this land, of the supervisors, who are controlled by the leading educators, and while a great many of them protest against this charter they do it silently. They dare not do it publicly for fear of incurring the displeasure of the men who sit in power and judgment over them, the supervisors and superintendents of education in the several cities and towns of the land.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit an interruption in that connection?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Not just now; later I will. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time I have remaining? I want to leave some time to answer queries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that I be kindly informed when I have four minutes left, as I desire to reserve that time for inquiries.

Now, how is this board of trustees chosen? Why, gentlemen, when you think of the tremendous powers that are to be exercised by such a board—practically absolute powers—you would conclude at once that they were selected in some manner which would make them truly representative of the main body. You would suppose that they were fairly representative of the members of the association, and that they were selected by democratic methods; but precisely the opposite is the fact in this case. I will find here in a few moments how these trustees are chosen.

The board of trustees—

Now, mark this, gentlemen, because it is an extremely important matter, and I fear that some gentlemen may be influenced in their judgment by the magic of the great names which have been paraded before the House; so that it becomes important to have a statement of facts to know the character of the bill we are passing upon.

The board of trustees shall consist of four members, elected by the board of directors for the term of four years, and the president of the association—

Not elected by the association, but by the board of directors, for the term of four years—and the president of the association, by virtue of his office, shall make the fifth member.

That is the board of trustees, not selected in any democratic way, not by any fair rule of selecting representative agents, but by the action of the board of directors alone. Can you devise, can ingenuity devise, a better means of perpetuating control of the funds of the teachers of the United States or the business which will come before them for discussion and action?

Now, Mr. Speaker, the board of directors is a well-intrenched body, too. You would expect that the board of directors, which has the selection of the governing agents of the association, namely, the board of trustees, would at least be controlled by the association; but it is not under this charter. Why? Because it is loaded up with the deadwood of the past; because there are provisions in this bill which make directors for life of certain gentlemen who are named in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's four minutes have arrived.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Under this bill the board of directors shall consist of a president, the first vice-president, the secretary, the treasurer, the chairman of the board of trustees (who, by the way, as a member of the board of directors helps elect himself a trustee), and of all life directors of the National Educational Association.

Then, the United States Commissioner of Education is made a member, "and all former presidents of the association" now living are made members "and all future presidents of the association." So that there will always be a body of old directors, sufficient in number to control the action of the board of directors. Remember that; and that the board of directors, which is not truly representative, selects four of the five trustees, who are also not representative, but who control the expenditure of every dollar of the funds and practically the exercise of every function of the association. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WEBB. Is the copy of the bill the gentleman is reading from the present bill?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It is.

Mr. WEBB. Does he not know that it is an exact copy of the charter of the association, under which they have been operating for twenty years? We refer to it because the board of directors are given power to select the board of trustees.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The board of trustees are given new powers under this charter, and the gentleman from North Carolina knows it. He knows that the board of trustees is given power that it has never before had, which gives them control of the permanent funds of the association.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the permanent fund of the association?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It is made up of all donations, together with accretions from time to time, and all savings from current funds. The current funds are made up principally from the general membership fees and dues of teachers of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman know what it amounts to at the present time?

Mr. RYAN and Mr. WEBB rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. RYAN. I have received information that there is some $150,000 at present in the fund. Under this bill, if it is enacted into law and this incorporation granted, will this new board of trustees have control over the expenditure of that money?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes. They will have more power than they now have. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will go on a little further.

Mr. WEBB. I should like to interrupt the gentleman right on this point.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In a moment. One of the reasons for objecting to this charter is this: That to-day any book agent or the agent of any publisher may be a voting member of this association. This association has the power to discuss courses of study. Their suggestions are frequently followed in the United States, so that indirectly they have the power to direct what books shall be used in the public schools; and a few years ago the Boston agent of the American Book Company was the president of the National Council of Education. There is a power—one which gentlemen may pay some attention to—that is significant in the extreme.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. You stated a moment ago in reply to the gentleman from New York that the board of trustees had complete control over the expenditure of this fund. Now, I will ask the gentleman if this is not the fact, that they do not have any control over the expenditure of the permanent fund, but only over the expenditure of the income?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman find it for me in the bill, if he is so sure?

Mr. WEBB. I will find it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The member of the committee in the rear of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBB] can point to the particular paragraph.

Mr. WEBB. It requires two-thirds of the active members to vote for it before one penny of it shall be expended.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I did not say anything different from that.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. You said that the permanent fund would be expended by the trustees.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I insist that I was right. I say that the association has no power to decide what expenditures shall be made. When the directors recommend to the trustees the expenditure of part of the principal of the permanent fund it is then that the members have the power, by a two-thirds vote of those present, to sanction that precise expenditure, but neither two-thirds nor four-fifths nor nine-tenths nor all the members of the association except those chosen few have the power to originate any scheme for the expenditure of a single dollar of the fund.

I insert as a part of my remarks section 7 of the bill, which proves that the members have no power whatever to direct how their money shall be spent, but only the power to accept or reject the particular plan proposed by the trustees. It shows also that the members have not even the power of ratification or rejection of expenditures of income.

SEC. 7. That the invested fund now known as the "Permanent fund of the National Educational Association," when transferred to the corporation hereby created, shall be held by such corporation as a permanent fund and shall be in charge of the board or trustees, who shall provide for the safekeeping and investment of such fund, and of all other funds which the corporation may receive by donation, bequest, or devise. No part of the principal of such permanent fund or its accretions shall be expended, except by a two-thirds vote of the active members of the association, present at any annual meeting, upon the recommendation of the board of trustees, after such recommendation has been approved by vote of the board of directors, and after printed notice of the proposed expenditure has been mailed to all active members of the association. The income of the permanent fund shall be used only to meet the cost of maintaining the organization of the association and of publishing its annual volume of proceedings, unless the terms of the donation, bequest, or devise shall otherwise specify, or the board of directors shall otherwise order. It shall also be the duty of the board of trustees to issue orders on the treasurer for the payment of all bills approved by the board of directors, or by the president and secretary of the association acting under the authority of the board of directors. When practicable, the board of trustees shall invest, as part of the permanent fund, all surplus funds exceeding $500 that shall remain in the hands of the treasurer after paying the expenses of the association for the previous year, and providing for the fixed expenses and for all appropriations made by the board of directors for the ensuing year.

The board of trustees shall elect the secretary of the association, who shall also be secretary of the executive committee, and shall fix the compensation and the term of his office for a period not to exceed four years.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has made a vigorous assault on this bill. In the limited time that I have I desire to explain the bill as I understand it and to answer some of the questions that have been asked by Members of this House.

In the first place, this is not a general Federal corporation, but is a corporation of the District of Columbia. This will be found in lines 15, 16, and 17, which read as follows:

And such other persons as now are or may hereafter be associated with them as officers or members of said association are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Are they limited to the transaction of business in the District of Columbia?

Mr. FLOYD. As far as their corporate existence is concerned they are limited just like any other District of Columbia corporation.

Mr. PADGETT. Limited in their name?

Mr. FLOYD. No, in their functions; just the same as any other District of Columbia corporation incorporated under the general laws of the District of Columbia. They have just that much power, and no more.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; exactly so. They have the power to go anywhere.

Mr. FLOYD. Now, in regard to another objection made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, he insists that the board of trustees have power over this permanent fund. I desire to submit that the funds are safeguarded better under this incorporation than they are under the original charter obtained under the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia, for in section 6, beginning with line 21, it is provided—

No part of the principal of such permanent fund or its accretions shall be expended except by a two-thirds vote of the active members of the association present at any annual meeting, upon the recommendation of the board of trustees, after such recommendation has been approved by vote of the board of directors, and after printed notice of the proposed expenditure has been mailed to all active members of the association.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman why it was that this charter was not procured in the regular way under the general law for incorporation in the District of Columbia, if there is nothing in it except a District of Columbia charter?

Mr. FLOYD. In answer to that question I will say that I know nothing as to the motives except at the last annual meeting of the National Educational Association, at Chicago, they brought up the proposition before that meeting, where there were over 400 delegates, to submit this charter to Congress and ask Congress to pass it. That was voted upon and carried by a large majority. Then the friends of the movement came before our committee and submitted this bill. We modified and changed the bill very much in form. Originally it was a general Federal corporation, and we changed it and made it a corporation of the District of Columbia. It gave the National Council of Education enlarged powers, and we changed and limited the National Council of Education so as to make it subject to control the same as the other departments named. We modified the bill in such a way that we considered there was no objection to it.

In that connection I will say that many educators throughout the land—superintendents of public instructions—almost overwhelmed the committee with letters and telegrams asking us to pass this bill. The opposition all came from Chicago. One lady, who is a teacher in Chicago, protested against it, and asked to be heard. We permitted her to come before the committee and gave a hearing lasting two hours, heard all the objections she urged, and amended the bill to meet valid objections, and if there are any objections besides what she made they have not reached my ears, until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] on the floor of the House opposed the passage of the bill.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question in reply to the one that was asked me as to the control of the funds?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not yield in the short time I have.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I have no more time.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not yield. I want to say a word. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is unnecessarily wrought up about the provisions of this bill. He insinuates that the men at the head of the organization through this bill seek an unfair advantage of the less prominent members. He speaks about the permanent fund that has been accumulated from the contributions paid by the teachers of the United States belonging to this organization. The gentleman says that under the provisions of this bill that fund may be disposed of at any time by the board of trustees. This is the mere assertion, sir, of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN]. It is not founded in fact. One of the primary objects of this bill is to protect this fund and to make it a permanent fund, a fund that can not be encroached upon or disposed of by any member or officer of the organization for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAWNEY. I decline to yield. No man who has read the bill can say that that is not a fact. The only part of the fund that can be disposed of in the discretion of the trustee or other officers of the organization is the accumulations resulting from the investment of this fund, and that can be expended only for purposes authorized by this association.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Oh, the gentleman knows that he is mistaken about that.

Mr. TAWNEY. The purpose is, I repeat, to protect the fund and to encourage not only members of the organization, but to encourage men of means interested in the work of this organization to contribute to this fund, thus enabling the organization to carry on the important work it is engaged in. This will be accomplished, Mr. Speaker, by the enactment of this bill making it impossible for those who in the future may control the organization from in any way interfering with or disposing of this fund without first securing an act of Congress authorizing it. This question was carefully considered at the last annual meeting of the National Educational Association at Asbury Park. At that meeting last summer this matter was discussed and acted upon by more than 800 teachers. Eight hundred of whom acted in favor of reincorporation upon the terms of this bill, and only 15 voted against it. This organization has a membership of more than 15,000, and the infinitesimal number opposed to this reorganization now seek through the gentleman from Massachusetts, the home of education, to prevent the accomplishment of that which is deemed essential to its future growth and increased usefulness.

Mr. Speaker, the secretary of the National Educational Association, Mr. Irwin Shepard, is my neighbor and personal friend. He has devoted the best part of his life to the upbuilding of this organization. He took hold of that work when the organization was in its infancy, and has built up a national educational institution which is not only the pride of every American interested in national education but an educational organization unexcelled by any nation in the world. I may be pardoned, therefore, if I resent, to some extent, the insinuation of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] that the men behind this bill are actuated by selfish or improper motives, or that they have any intention or desire to take advantage of any member of the association however humble that member may be.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Were the provisions of this bill discussed at the meeting referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. TAWNEY. The identical provisions in the bill were discussed and adopted. The constitution and by-laws under which the association has existed for twenty years are incorporated in this bill, with the added security to the permanent fund.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It did not exist for twenty years under the authority of Congress, by a charter of Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, yes. The law under which the association was incorporated was enacted by Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why didn't they go to New York?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I now yield thirty seconds to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the class of teachers for whom the gentleman from Massachusetts speaks—the common-school teachers—have sent requests here by the thousands in favor of this bill. My constituents visited this meeting spoken of by the gentleman from Minnesota, and there they understood the purpose of this bill, because they discussed and heard it discussed, and, returning, made their wishes known to Congress and the Members of this House. While I know but little about the different provisions of the bill—and if I did, have not the opportunity to discuss them—these intelligent people who have memorialized Congress should have their express wishes complied with, and I shall vote for their bill and am gratified to have the chance.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I admire the chivalry and eloquence of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He stands up here on the floor of the House as the sole opponent of this bill. He is eloquent, we will all admit, and chivalrous because he stands up here representing the lady who was the only opponent of the bill before the Committee on Education. We devoted five hearings to this bill, all differences were reconciled and harmonized, and this bill comes before the House with the unanimous report from the Committee on Education.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate may extend ten minutes longer. I believe there has been a great deal of misrepresentation in regard to the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the debate be extended for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM. I object. The gentleman took ten minutes' time for an explanation and wouldn't answer a question.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for sufficient time to read section 7, which exposes the power of the board of trustees, and surely the gentleman will not object to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM. I object, Mr. Speaker; the gentleman would not reply when we asked him questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has a right to object, but not to speak on his objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules, agree to the amendments, and pass the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 140, noes 37.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-one gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

INSANE ASYLUM, TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13675) to ratify and confirm the acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, passed in the year 1905, relating to an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma and providing for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma at Fort Supply, in Woodward County, Okla., and making appropriations therefor, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, entitled "An act accepting the offer made by Congress to the Territory of Oklahoma, granting to such Territory the use of Fort Supply Military Reservation and the buildings thereon for the purpose of an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma, and providing for the care of the insane of the Territory of Oklahoma," approved March 1, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, in all things ratified, approved, and confirmed, and that section 14 of an act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, entitled "An act making appropriation for current expenses of the Territory of Oklahoma for the years 1905 and 1906, and for deficiency appropriations and for miscellaneous purposes," approved March 11, 1905, be, and the same is hereby, in all things ratified, approved, and confirmed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FIELD GUNS AND EQUIPMENT FROM CONNECTICUT.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4111) to authorize the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, to receive four 3.6-inch breech-loading field guns, carriages, caissons, limbers, and their pertaining equipment from the State of Connecticut, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is hereby authorized and empowered to receive back from the State of Connecticut the four 3.6-inch breech-loading field guns, carriages, caissons, limbers, and their pertaining material, which were sold to the State by the Ordnance Department for the sum of $12,405.08 on June 29, 1901.

SEC. 2. That no part of the value of this material shall be paid to the State of Connecticut, but the whole amount received from the sale thereof to the State shall stand as a credit to the quota of the State, the same as though allotted from the annual appropriations under the provisions of section 1661, Revised Statutes, as amended, and subject to all the conditions thereof.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $12,405.08 is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying this act into effect.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be read the third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAPRON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members be allowed to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 10501) to incorporate the National Educational Association of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that Members may extend their remarks on the bill to incorporate the National Education Association of the United States. Is there objection?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why does the gentleman want to have Members extend their remarks on this bill?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. There were some Members of the committee who could not secure time to speak who were anxious to speak.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Simply to present the views of the committee?

Mr. SOUTHWICK. To present their individual views.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members be permitted to extend their remarks on the employers' liability bill, passed early this afternoon, for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that Members be permitted to extend their remarks on the employers' liability bill for five legislative days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECORDER OF DEEDS, ETC., OSAGE INDIAN RESERVATION, OKLA.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17220) providing for a recorder of deeds, etc., in the Osage Indian Reservation, in Oklahoma Territory, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Osage Indian Reservation, in Oklahoma Territory, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a recording district for the purpose of recording and filing deeds, mortgages, and other instruments in writing affecting property within said reservation. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a suitable person as said recorder, whose office shall be located at the town of Pawhuska, on said reservation. As compensation for services the said recorder is hereby authorized to retain the fees legally collected by him for the recording of deeds, etc., up to and including the sum of $1,800 per annum, and the fees shall be the same as are charged for like service in other recording districts in said Territory. If the receipts of said office exceed the said sum of $1,800, the said excess shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States. This act shall not be construed to in any way obligate the Government to pay the said recorder any deficiency below the sum of $1,800 yearly.

SEC. 2. That all deeds, papers, and other instruments recorded by said recorder in the Osage Nation shall have the same effect, legally or otherwise, as if recorded in the recording office of any regularly organized county in the Oklahoma Territory.

With the following amendments:

In line 5, page 1, after the word "filing," add the word "such."

In line 6, page 1, after the word "writing," add the following: "as are authorized by the laws of Oklahoma."

Strike out the following words in lines 7, 8, and 9, to wit: "the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a suitable person as said recorder, whose office shall be located at the town of Pawhuska, on said reservation," and insert in lieu thereof "and the deputy clerk of the district court located at the town of Pawhuska, on said reservation, shall be ex officio register of deeds."

In line 12, page 1, strike out the words "as forth" and insert in lieu thereof the words "other instruments."

In line 14, after the word "fees," insert the words "collected by him."

In line 1, page 2, after the word "Territory," add "said recorder shall make monthly reports to the Secretary of the Interior of the fees collected by him, and said Secretary is hereby authorized to use such part of said fees as may be needed for the purchase of records, books, supplies, and expenses of said office."

In line 12, page 2, after the word "Territory," add the following proviso at the end of section 2: "Provided, That this act shall become inoperative when the Osage Reservation shall become an organized county of Oklahoma, and all records shall be turned over to the proper county officers whenever such county is organized."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire the necessity for the recorder of deeds where there can be no deeds executed?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, this bill makes the Osage Indian Reservation, in Oklahoma, a recording district for the purpose of recording deeds, mortgages, and other instruments in writing affecting property within the reservation. This action by Congress is made necessary for the reason that there is no law of Oklahoma which provides for the recording of deeds, mortgages, or leases on real property within the Osage Reservation.

A law enacted on the 4th of March, 1905, authorized the laying out of certain towns within the Osage Reservation and provided for the sale of the lots in each of said towns. Under that act the towns of Pawhuska, Hominy, Gray Horse, Fairfax, Bigheart, and Foreaker have been laid out. The lots in the town of Pawhuska have been sold and the dates for the sale of lots in the other towns have been fixed. There will therefore be issued several thousand deeds which can not be recorded, and it is hoped, to meet this situation, that this bill will be acted upon speedily and favorably.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROVISIONS OF RECLAMATION ACT EXTENDED TO TEXAS.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 14184.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, the title of which the Clerk will read, the bill having been read on a former day.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14184) to extend the irrigation act to the State of Texas.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to see if I can make some arrangement——

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, is it the purpose to try to pass this bill this evening?

Mr. LACEY. There is an agreement that we shall have time to debate this bill.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much time?

Mr. LACEY. That question is unsettled, but I think there should be an hour on a side.

Mr. BONYNGE. There should be at least that. If it is not intended to pass this bill now, I will not make any objection to calling it up.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not propose to press this bill to a vote to-day.

Mr. LACEY. It might take more time, depending upon the nature of the discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was informed by the gentleman from Texas and also by the gentleman from Iowa that if unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill was given at this time, that they would then assent, it then being in the nature of unfinished business, to its going over until another day.

Mr. LACEY. That is the understanding, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, before that is done, is there to be debate on this question?

The SPEAKER. Not this evening; it will come up at a later day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The understanding is, I believe, there is to be two hours' debate—an hour to a side.

Mr. KEIFER. When is that?

The SPEAKER. It is impossible to tell.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whenever the unfinished business comes up under the rules of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I will not object now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

EXPENSES ON ACCOUNT OF CERTAIN TREATY WITH SPAIN.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General is requested to inform the House of the name and date of appointment of every person appointed under the act of Congress entitled "An act to carry into effect the stipulations of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded on the 10th day of December, 1898," approved March 2, 1901, the position held by each person, and the amount of compensation for each person by the hour, day, week, month, or year, and the amount of expenses in addition to compensation, if any.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of the resolution as follows: "And the total amount paid for salaries, compensation, and expenses from the 2d day of March, 1901, to the present time."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up resolution No. 376.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to inform the House of the total amount paid by the United States on account of the act of Congress entitled "An act to carry into effect the stipulations of article 7 of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded on the 10th day of December, 1898," approved March 2, 1901, and the several acts amendatory thereof, for salaries, expenses, costs, compensation, and allowances of every kind and nature, and the amount allowed in favor of claimants and against the United States.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out all of lines 10 and 11 and insert in lieu thereof: "Number and amount of claims allowed in favor of claimants and against the United States; and the number and amount of claims determined in favor of the United States; and the number and amount of claims now pending."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. ADOLPH FORSTER, assistant secretary to the President of the United States.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS OF THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without approval, House bill No. 15521, for the reasons set forth in the following letter from the Acting Attorney-General:

"I have the honor to reply to your letter of March 22, 1906, inclosing H. R., 'An act establishing regular terms of the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of California at Eureka, Cal.,' and asking to be advised whether I know of any objection to its approval.

"I regard as specially and highly objectionable the following part of the measure: 'Provided, however, That Humboldt County, Cal., shall furnish a suitable place in which to hold said court, free of all charges and expenses, until such time as the United States shall make provisions for a place in which to hold the same.'

"It appears to me that terms of courts should not depend upon whether some county will furnish gratuitously a place therefor. If such terms are unnecessary they should not be required, and if necessary should not depend upon the gratuitous action of any place.

"Eureka is an isolated place on the California coast, some 230 miles from San Francisco. Short lines of railroads lead out from it, but do not reach into any of the adjacent counties. It must, therefore, be approached either by sea or overland.

"Possibly it would be a convenience to the citizens of Humboldt, Del Norte, and Trinity counties in California if terms of the Federal courts were held at Eureka. But the amount of business originating in those counties is very small. I am advised that in those counties during the last two years there originated 16 suits (civil and criminal), and that out of 682 bankruptcy matters in the district court 25 originated in the three counties specified.

"The Federal courts at San Francisco are now crowded with work, and a new district judge seems necessary in order to keep the dockets clear.

"To establish terms of court at Eureka will impose a very considerable expense upon the Government and increase the labors of the judges, clerk, and district attorney.

"In view of all the facts, I do not think the public interest would be subserved by permitting the bill to become law."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 2, 1906.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROCK CREEK PARK.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill (H. R. 6000) to rectify the boundary line of Rock Creek Park was changed from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1345. An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 5954. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate gold certificate, in lieu of one lost, to Lincoln National Bank, of Lincoln, Ill.;

H. R. 14808. An act authorizing the Choctawhatchee Power Company to erect a dam in Dale County, Ala.;

H. R. 16671. An act permitting the building of a dam across the St. Joseph River near the village of Berrien Springs, Berrien County, Mich.; and

H. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution for the publication of eulogies delivered in Congress on Hon. JOHN W. CRANFORD, late a Representative in Congress.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LEGARE indefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. PAYNE. I renew my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York renews his motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Postmaster-General submitting an estimate of appropriation for service of the Post-Office Department for 1906 and prior years—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, papers relating to the private land claim of Isaac Crow, assignee of Vincent Michele—to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 3, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MAIL SERVICE IN PORTO RICO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, calling attention to the passage by the House of Representatives of the bill (H. R. 11976) for the relief of the Campañía de los Ferrocarriles de Puerto Rico, appropriating $13,694.45 for compensation for mail service performed in Porto Rico during the period of military occupation in the years 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, and 1902, etc., and suggesting that inasmuch as this company has a judgment for $11,509.54, the House bill be amended by the Senate to carry only the difference between such amount and the original sum found to be due, $13,694.45—that is, $2,184.91, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

TITLE TO LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with accompanying papers, relative to the private land claim of Isaac Crow, assignee of Vincent Michele, situated in what was known as neutral territory between Rio Hondo and the Sabine River, etc., together with the draft of a bill to confirm titles to certain lands in the State of Louisiana and to restore other lands to settlement and entry; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4111) to authorize the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, to receive four 3.6-inch breech-loading field guns, carriages, caissons, limbers, and their pertaining equipment from the State of Connecticut.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 5276. An act relating to appointments to the Naval Academy, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10501. An act to incorporate the National Educational Association of the United States;

H. R. 13675. An act to ratify and confirm the acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, passed in the year 1905, relating to an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma and providing for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma at Fort Supply, in Woodward County, Okla., and making appropriations therefor;

H. R. 15266. An act to amend existing laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines;

H. R. 15513. An act to declare and enforce the forfeiture provided by section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States;" and

H. R. 17220. An act providing for a recorder of deeds, and so forth, in the Osage Indian Reservation, in Oklahoma Territory.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1345) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

RAILWAY COAL MONOPOLY.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter. It is along the line of the information in regard to the railroad situation, and another flashlight on a different phase of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the letter as requested by the Senator from South Carolina? If not, the Secretary will read.

Mr. HALE. I do not object, but I think the Senator has "got even."

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not actuated by any malice at all in this matter; I am not trying to "get even;" but it was such a valuable idea, that had not occurred to me, I feel I ought to follow it up at least for a few days longer. This letter relates to an entirely new phase of the subject. It goes to the other end of the coal monopoly.

Mr. KEAN. Why not put it in when the rate bill is up?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is in the nature of a petition or memorial.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the letter?

Mr. HALE. I am not going to object, but the Senator is a veteran here now, and I think he will see that if letters which are sent to Senators are presented, although they may, in effect, be petitions, any Senator, a dozen Senators, may have letters in his morning mail and may ask that they be read from the desk, and it encumbers our proceedings. They will come in naturally as a part of the debate. I only make this suggestion to the Senator in good faith.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is a short one, and I hope the Senator will let it go along. It may be that I will take his kind admonitions. I will at least consider them very seriously.

Mr. HALE. I guess we had better compromise on that and let the letter be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., March 29, 1906.

Senator TILLMAN, Washington, D. C.

HONORED AND DEAR SIR: I appeal to you for sympathy and help.

My case is this: For over twelve years I have made a comfortable living for myself, invalid wife, and our children, now four in number, all in school, at the retail coal business.

The D. & H. Railroad Company, from whom I have bought all my anthracite coal, has of late been playing "the dog in the manger." They claim that they can not fill my orders. Now it is shortage of cars, then shortage of coal. In either case I don't get the coal.

But this is not all, for they will not have any other company send me coal on their account, nor will they allow any other company to ship coal to me over their lines. Their attitude is, Take what we give you and then go without—a method that is death on my business.

Strange, but not strange, they seem to have both coal and cars enough to keep their imported man, who during the past summer and winter built for them a large coal pocket in our town, supplied with coal, so he can take care of both his and our customers.

Once more, their imported man has cut the price of coal to 5 cents a ton less than cost, which is 60 cents a ton less than in the neighboring cities of Albany, Troy, and Schenectady.

In these two ways, then, the D. & H. is trying to kill off the old dealers in town—cutting price and cutting the supply. We appeal to you and ask you to use your influence to prevent them from accomplishing their purpose.

The D. & H. claim the right to retail their own coal. Now, if they have this right, then sooner or later they will get to using that right. When that time comes, then out go all the dealers along the line of their roads. Have they such a right? If so, then the many must suffer at the hands of the few; the people at the hands of the monopoly.

Will you please do what you can to protect us so we may go and make an honorable living?

Oblige, yours, truly, C. W. ENNS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will lie on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, will the Senator from Maine permit me just one minute?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. This is like the voice of a child in the night, to use Tennyson's simile; it is like—

> An infant crying in the night:
> An infant crying for the light,
> And with no language but a cry.

You find there this condition. This railroad is one of the five which monopolize absolutely the anthracite coal production and traffic in the United States. They are not satisfied with monopolizing the coal supply and transportation, but they now engage in the business of retailing it.

That is all. I merely wanted to emphasize what this man has appealed to us to try to stop.

PUNISHMENT FOR HAZING AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3890) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows:

In section 1, line 5, of said amendment, after the word "of," insert the following: "the facts upon which are based."

At the end of section 1 of said amendment add the following: "And the truth of any issue of fact so raised, except upon the record of demerit, shall be determined by a board of inquiry convened by the Secretary of the Navy under the rules and regulations for the government of the Navy."

And the House agree to the same.

EUGENE HALE,
CHARLES DICK,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

EDWARD B. VREELAND,
GEO. A. LOUD,
L. P. PADGETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

A bill (S. 5495) for the relief of the trustees of the Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church, of Front Royal, Va. (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5496) for the relief of the heirs of S. W. Thrift.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 5497) to place Dr. Henry Smith on the retired list of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND introduced a bill (S. 5498) granting additional lands adjacent to its site to the University of Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FULTON introduced a bill (S. 5499) to quiet the title to certain lands in the Klamath Indian Reservation in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLEE introduced a bill (S. 5500) for the relief of Joseph F. Wells; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ANKENY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5501) granting an increase of pension to Jacob L. Kline; and

A bill (S. 5502) granting an increase of pension to John R. Coyle.

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 5503) for the relief of Albert R. Heilig; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KITTREDGE introduced a bill (S. 5504) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Dickson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 5505) to remove the charge of desertion standing against the name of John Murphy, alias John Martin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a bill (S. 5506) granting an increase of pension to William J. Dowell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLARD introduced a bill (S. 5507) granting an increase of pension to Levi C. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURKETT introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5508) granting an increase of pension to John M. Bair; and

A bill (S. 5509) granting an increase of pension to C. W. Lyman (with accompanying papers).

Mr. SCOTT introduced a bill (S. 5510) granting a pension to Charles M. Snyder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 5511) providing for the control of grazing upon the public lands in the arid States and Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 5512) defining the qualifications of jurors in Porto Rico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment relative to the band at the United States Naval Academy, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill H. R. 12987, an act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. BAILEY. I present an amendment which I intend at the proper time to propose to the rate bill. I ask that it be printed.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Before the word "the," in line 18, on page 2, insert the following:
"The term common carrier, as used in this act, shall include express companies and sleeping-car companies."

Mr. BAILEY. The purpose of it, I will say to the Senator, is to remove any doubt and make it certain that both express companies and sleeping-car companies are included in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business—House bill 12987—be laid before the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Before that is taken up, I should like to call up the conference report on House bill 5976, which was laid over at the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. In presenting the matter that I desire some little time will be occupied; and I understand the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] intends to take the floor this morning. I suggest that we take up the conference report immediately after he concludes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado is not heard at the desk.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is suggested to me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that I proceed.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think it will take long.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; not very long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before the Senator from Colorado proceeds, the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 5276. An act relating to appointments to the Naval Academy, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

H. R. 10501. An act to incorporate the National Education Association of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

H. R. 13675. An act to ratify and confirm the acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma passed in the year 1905, relating to an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma, and providing for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma at Fort Supply, in Woodward County, Okla., and making appropriations therefor, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

H. R. 15266. An act to amend existing laws relating to the fortification of pure sweet wines was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 15513. An act to declare and enforce the forfeiture provided by section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 17220. An act providing for a recorder of deeds, and so forth, in the Osage Indian Reservation, in Oklahoma Territory, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

H. R. 239. An act relating to liability of common carriers by railroads in the District of Columbia and Territories and common carriers by railroads engaged in commerce between the States and between the States and foreign nations to their employees, was read twice by its title.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, that is the bill known as the "employers' liability bill." Of course it will go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I simply desire to call the attention of the committee to the bill and to the fact that I made a laborious effort during the last session of Congress to get a report from the Senate committee. I hope the committee will give prompt attention to the bill, so that the Senate may have a report one way or the other on the measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13103) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not know whether the matter I desire to call the attention of the Senate to is amendable or can be reached at this time. I will state the status of it.

Section 4 of the bill to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, etc., came over from the House and was amended in the Senate. The House conferees have concurred in the amendment of the Senate. It is a modification of that amendment that I think is quite desirable, in order that justice may be done to a considerable number of descendants of Indians living in the Indian Territory. Of course, all I could hope to accomplish, if that can be done, is to have some intimation or indication given to the conferees on the part of the Senate that a modification of the amendment would be desirable, so that the conferees might take up the matter again and see whether the modification I suggest could be adopted.

Section 4 of the bill is one that has reference to the transferring of the names of freedmen, or those who are called "freedmen," to the rolls of citizens. It provides, as it passed the House, that—

No name shall be transferred from the approved freedmen, or any other approved rolls of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes, respectively, to the roll of citizens by blood, unless the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes show that application for enrollment as a citizen by blood was made within the time prescribed by law by or for the party seeking the transfer, and said record shall be conclusive evidence as to the fact of such application—

This amendment was added by the Senate—unless it be shown by documentary evidence that the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes actually received such application within the time prescribed by law.

As I understand the situation, it is this: Under the law citizens (those I suppose are Indians of full blood primarily and those who are known as "freedmen;" that is, those who were slaves originally to the Indians) were to have a certain amount of allotable land—320 acres in two of the nations, and 160 acres in two other of the nations, and the freedmen but 40 acres. But under the law descendants of Indians, of whatever blood their parents may have been, so they are the descendants of members of either of those tribes, are entitled to be enrolled as citizens, therefore securing the same amount of these lands other Indians do.

For the purpose of making the enrollment originally those who had the matter in charge went to different parts of the Indian Territory with several tents, one tent to be used for the enrollment of citizens, the other to be used for the enrollment of freedmen, and different officers were in charge of the different tents. Notices were sent out and when Indians by descent, but with negro blood instead of other blood with the Indian blood, went to the tent for the enrollment of citizens they were directed to the tent for the enrollment of freedmen, those having the matter in charge going upon the theory that if their claim to citizenship was through negro parents they were not entitled to be enrolled as citizens.

That was a clear mistake of the law, as was subsequently decided, and those engaged in the enrollment attempted thereafter to correct the error they had been committing. But it did not reach those who had already made application as they believed under the law, and had been turned off to the tent for the enrollment of freedmen, and who were enrolled as freedmen, and by that enrollment were given the status simply of negroes without any strain of Indian blood whatever.

There is a large number of the inhabitants of the Indian Territory who were entitled to be enrolled as citizens and thereby receive the portion of land and other property that goes to citizens who, by reason of such errors, are enrolled as feedmen and are limited to 40 acres of land for that reason.

By this amendment, which prohibits the transfer of names from the roll of freedmen to the roll of citizens except by documentary proof that such application was absolutely made, they are practically prohibited from the benefit of the law, because when you come to crystallize the term "documentary evidence" it simply means the proof of the rolls themselves, and if they are not on the roll to which they seek to be transferred it is impossible to have their names placed there. This notice might just as well have provided that such transfer shall be made but it shall only be made in the event that the names were already there.

There is a wide difference between documentary evidence and written evidence. There are no documents in the true sense applicable to the question that is involved in this amendment except the rolls themselves. Therefore it is utterly impossible that anybody shall receive any benefit under the amendment which was added to this section by the Senate.

The suggestion I make is that the word "documentary" be changed for the word "competent," so as to read "unless it be shown by competent evidence;" and let the rights of the parties when they are litigated be determined, whether by the Commissioner or by the Secretary of the Interior or by the courts, if the question shall get there, by what is competent evidence in every court in the land. If it is such a question as requires proof by written evidence let it be written evidence, but if oral testimony is competent, then let the truth and the rights of the parties be determined by oral testimony.

But surely, Mr. President, there is nothing in the status of those enrolled freedmen, who ought to be enrolled as citizens, that should prohibit them from having the change made, if they are permitted to make application at all, by competent evidence, such evidence as is receivable in any court of the land, for the purpose of establishing any controverted fact.

I want to read an affidavit which, to my mind, establishes very clearly that the manner in which this enrollment was originally conducted has been correctly stated by me:

W. L. Bennett, first being duly sworn, on oath states that he is 35 years old, a resident of the Chickasaw Nation, Ind. T., and lives at the inland town of Woodford, in said nation.

Affiant further states that when the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes came down into the Choctaw and Chickasaw country for the purpose of enrolling persons who claimed rights in either of the said nations, a committee of freedmen was appointed to act on behalf of the nation with said Commission for the purpose of aiding them in identifying persons entitled to enrollment as freedmen of the nations. He states that he accompanied said committee in the capacity of an employee and was with them continuously from the time they began their work at Stonewall, Ind. T., until the Commission finished its work at Ardmore, Ind. T.

He further states that it was a rule of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes that when a person appeared in the tent wherein applications were received for enrollment as citizens by blood, and who looked to be a freedman, he was not allowed to make application there, but was directed to another tent in which application for enrollment as freedmen only was received. It was further a rule of said Commission that no person claiming either as a citizen by blood or as a freedman would be enrolled if their mother was a stateswoman.

By which I suppose is meant a woman who did not belong to the Indians, but who originally lived in the States, whatever her nativity or color might be.

He states that this rule of the Commission, in as far as it affected freedmen, was shortly changed, and persons were enrolled as freedmen whether they descended as such from either mother or father; but that the rule was never changed, so far as affiant can now remember, in the matter of the enrollment of persons of negro blood who claimed descent from an Indian citizen.

Whether they were of negro blood or of any other blood, so they were descendants in whatever degree from Indian parentage or from Indian ancestors, they were just as much entitled to such enrollment; but the rule was adopted, and carried out and not changed, that they should not be transferred or put upon the roll of citizens, although they were entitled to be so placed if they were persons of negro blood who claimed descent from Indian citizens.

Affiant further states that so far as he can now remember he does not recall a single instance in which an application was received by the Commissioner in charge of the tent wherein application was made for enrollment as citizens by blood, but that in each and every instance persons of mixed negro and Indian blood appeared at that tent and asserted their rights to be enrolled as citizens of the Chickasaw Nation were directed to the freedmen tent.

Affiant states that hundreds of persons were thus prevented from making application for enrollment as citizens by blood of the Chickasaw Nation.

Mr. President, I have in my hand transcripts from testimony taken by this Commissioner, or these Commissioners, of different citizens through negro parentage, who clearly indicated in their testimony that they were citizens of right under the law by reason of their Indian ancestors, notwithstanding which they were enrolled simply as freedmen.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if the law provided any degree of blood as entitling the parties to registry as citizens.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understand, Mr. President, answering the Senator's question, that the law did not limit any to what the Senator terms a "degree of blood;" but as they were descendants from Indian ancestors, and provided also that they had always lived within the Indian Territory, then they were entitled under the law to enrollment as citizens.

Mr. CARTER. Then, Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator whether it is a fact that the persons registered as freedmen were only those who were negroes without Indian blood?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is my understanding of the law—that they were negroes without Indian blood, those who had formerly been slaves, and, I suppose, by reason of their condition of vassalage to the Indians, received this small quantity of land.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this matter of the Five Civilized Tribes has been heard of in one or the other Chamber for many, many years. I confess a certain amount of general but no specific information on the subject. I therefore desire to ask the Senator from Colorado another question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am giving the Senator the information, so far as I can give it, to the best of my ability.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly. I understand that the citizens consisted of persons of Indian blood and the freedmen consisted of persons of negro blood.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is right.

Mr. CARTER. And that the contention here is that persons of Indian blood were denied registry on the proper roll and compelled to register contrary to the facts and their rights under the freedmen roll. Is that the contention?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is the contention. Those who are citizens by virtue of having Indian blood and being entitled to enrollment on the roll of citizens were denied that right and by reason of their negro blood forced to enroll on the roll of freedmen.

Mr. CARTER. Now, then, this section 4, to which the Senator is addressing himself, was intended to permit those who had been wrongfully or erroneously denied the right of enrollment as citizens to come forward now and prove the fact. Is that correct?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. CARTER. And the proof, according to the amendment, must be by documentary evidence? What documents are connected with the transaction that constitute documentary evidence?

Mr. PATTERSON. I know of no documents but the rolls themselves.

Mr. CARTER. Do the rolls themselves show the individual names of those who applied for registration and were denied the privilege?

Mr. PATTERSON. There is nothing in the rolls at all to show that.

Mr. CARTER. Then the use of the word "documentary" instead of "competent" is equivalent to an absolute denial of the right of these people to enrollment in the proper place?

Mr. PATTERSON. It makes this amendment and this section a farce, because, as I said before, they might as well have provided that the names of citizens may be transferred from the rolls of the freedmen to the rolls of the citizens, provided they are already on the citizens' roll. That is the effect of it; but of course it is the reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. CARTER. There being no documents to appeal to and no documents filed, confining the proof to documentary evidence is the denial of the right to make any proof.

Mr. PATTERSON. Precisely. I can see no escape from that proposition.

As I said, Mr. President—and I shall not occupy much more time—I hold in my hand certified extracts from the testimony given by persons who are citizens by reason of their descent from Indian ancestors, who were examined; and this testimony carries with it either the direct statement, or statement by fair implication, that those who were giving the testimony were entitled to be enrolled as citizens; but nevertheless in every instance they were enrolled as freedmen. This mass of testimony that I hold in my hand, being certified extracts from testimony given when the process of enrollment was going on—about the authenticity of which there is no room for doubt—represents in the neighborhood of a hundred of just such persons. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that common, ordinary justice requires, if these people have rights, that they shall be permitted to establish their rights by competent evidence.

I know the claim is made that, unless you confine the applicants to documentary evidence, fraud in many instances will be perpetrated. It might as well be said that competent evidence should be eliminated in every instance where there is danger that fraud may be perpetrated. Of course nobody would concur in a statement of that kind, for tribunals are provided, whatever the character of the tribunals may be, whose duty it is, sitting as judges, to determine from competent evidence what is the real case and what is the fraud.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the Senator to say that it is absolutely impossible for these men to prove their rights, if they have rights, by documentary evidence—that it does not exist?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, it is my understanding that there is no documentary evidence outside of the rolls themselves.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that my recollection is that the claim of the attorneys who pressed for this amendment when they came here was based on the statement that there were documents, and that all they asked was based on documents. Afterwards they discovered, probably to their surprise, that it would not admit of parole evidence to the effect that a man had gone to some camp and been sent by somebody, whom he would not name, to some other camp, and thus was put on the wrong roll. But the attorneys at first—I am very positive about that—insisted that if we would put this provision in the bill they had the documentary evidence. I understand that as to a large number of these claims the records of their rejection are in the Interior Department to-day. But all they wanted at that time was what I have stated. Afterwards they discovered that the provision was not as broad as they would like to have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I would say that I propounded the question I did for the reason that a gentleman, whom I have known and in whom I have great confidence, a little time ago told me the fact—or what he asserted to be a fact—that it was impossible to secure documentary evidence in these cases, and, as I recall it, he suggested what the Senator now suggests, that competent or satisfactory evidence should be considered sufficient.

It seems to me that if these people have been denied their rights because they chance to have a little negro blood in them, while all other mixed breeds in that Territory are granted the maximum under the law so far as land is concerned, there ought to be some way to secure for these people their rights, if their rights have been denied to them.

It occurs to me that the contention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] is sound, and it ought to be accepted that "competent evidence" should be considered sufficient to establish their rights.

I, of course, know very little about this matter, and I will say to the distinguished chairman of the committee that I am only speaking from the standpoint of what I think is common justice, if justice has been denied those people.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. It might be said, I think, without any qualification, that the use of the word "competent" would be equivalent to enacting that anyone whom these attorneys now brought for transfer should be transferred. There is positively no way of meeting oral testimony. It would simply open the door to a flood of perjury there that would be disgraceful, in my humble opinion, and the word "competent" would be no limitation upon that condition. There is only one word, it strikes me, to be used there. If the word "documentary" is too technical, perhaps the word "written" might answer the purpose. They claim that they made application by letter, which they mailed under the registered letter provision, and I am free to say that we put the word "documentary" in there with the idea that those letters, being mailed and being part of the case, would be documentary evidence; but if that is too technical the difficulty might, perhaps, in a measure be obviated by the use of the word "written." But if you leave it open to oral testimony and say "competent," you might as well withdraw every qualification or limitation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Minnesota state, approximately, if he has the figures, how many people will be affected by this? I do not know; but will it be a very large number?

Mr. CLAPP. That would depend upon whether they were limited to written evidence or whether they could come in to-day and make parole proof that they appeared at this camp or that camp and that somebody, whom they do not have to name, in one camp directed them to the other tent. If that was the rule, there would be a very large number affected.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to suggest, in response to the observations of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], that the very highest possible premium would be placed upon the controversion of any false testimony in these cases. The whole body of the registered citizens would be interested in sifting down the truth of any allegation made, because the transfer from the freedmen's list to the citizens' list involves an increase to the extent of 280 acres of land in the allotment.

Mr. GALLINGER. In each case?

Mr. CARTER. In each case. And where the citizens predominate so largely, as in this case, I believe, and it seems quite fair to suppose, perjury would not go unchallenged; that false testimony could not go without being checked up promptly.

Again, the suggestion that competent evidence can not be tolerated by the statute law of the country because, forsooth, there may be perjury is scarcely an answer to the man who has a just cause and can only make it manifest through oral testimony, to be given by himself and his neighbors.

I doubt if the apprehension of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is well founded where the interests in challenging the correctness of statements are so great and where the witnesses on guard are so numerous as in the case of the citizens who desire to protect their patrimony from invasion.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] allow me to ask a question of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator from Montana if, in his experience with the Indians, he has ever found them to be very carefully on guard to protect their own rights when it came to going out of their way and spending time and money, if necessary, in order to secure proper evidence to protect those rights? My experience has been just to the contrary, and my experience, and my observation also, have led me to believe that all of the wrongs that have been perpetrated upon those Indians down there have been perpetrated because of their lack of ability to look after their rights, when it would seem as though, if they would open their eyes at all or take any interest, they could have prevented the frauds that have been perpetrated upon them. I do not think they will in this case.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes to be above the average in ability and experience in the transaction of business. It is true that our Indians of the plains, living in tribal relations and having no business responsibility, have been and are careless in the transaction of all their business affairs. There are notable exceptions, of course; but in the main the Indians of the plains are, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] suggests, careless as to business methods. They are not precise as to meeting engagements, nor do they understand well how to protect themselves; but, as I understand the fact to be, the various tribes represented and being dealt with here have employed counsel from time to time to guard and protect their rights; and this citizens' roll will doubtless be protected with the utmost vigilance, if not by the Indians, at least by those employed by the Indians to protect their interests.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from Colorado yield to the senior Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. It is quite evident that this discussion will continue for some time. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], who gave notice of his intention to speak this morning, is ready to go on, and I ask the chairman of the committee if it would not be better to postpone this discussion and allow the Senator from Kansas to proceed with his speech. We may subsequently resume the consideration of the conference report either to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I dislike to inconvenience the Senator from Kansas, but this matter has been before the Senate for several days, and I have been obliged to let it lie over from time to time until Senators who wanted to speak upon it could be here. It is a mere matter of sufferance now. There was objection made by a point of order, which practically withdrew the report. I do not think it will take long for the Senator from Colorado to conclude his remarks, and then I will formally withdraw the report from the Senate. How long will it take the Senator?

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator hardly understands the situation. I ask unanimous consent that the conference report be laid aside and that the Senator from Kansas be allowed to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to say that, at the conclusion of the Senator's speech, I shall insist upon whatever rights remain to the conference report, even to the extent of objecting to unanimous consent.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have no objection at all to the Senator from Kansas proceeding.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the pending bill is framed upon the assumption that certain propositions have been settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court during the last thirty years. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], in the able and carefully prepared speech which he delivered some time ago in the Senate, challenged nearly all of these propositions, and if the speech had been made before these decisions were delivered, it would undoubtedly have made a much stronger impression in the Senate and the country than it did. Mr. Richard Olney, ex-Attorney-General and ex-Secretary of State, clearly described the situation in the closing words of his article in the North American Review of last October when he stated that if the propositions which he contended for, which were the same as those advanced by the Senator from Ohio, had been presented to the Supreme Court a half or even a quarter of a century ago, they would, in all human probability, have been determined adversely to the jurisdiction of Congress to fix rates. But the Supreme Court almost thirty years ago decided the case of Munn v. Illinois. (94 U. S., 113.) The question decided in that case was that a State had the power, through its legislature, to prescribe a maximum charge for services performed for the public. That case has never been reversed, but has been followed from the day that it was delivered and should be considered as the settled law in this country.

The court also at the same term decided what are known as the "Granger Railroad cases," and since that time certain propositions relating to railroad regulation by governmental authority have been considered as finally determined. It has also been decided by the Supreme Court that a State can regulate railroad rates through a commission, and the leading cases deciding this doctrine are the Reagan case (154 U. S., 362) and Railway Commission cases (116 U. S., 307).

The Senator from Ohio in his speech took the position boldly that Congress did not have the power to fix rates of transportation, and that if it did have that power it could not delegate it to a commission, as contemplated by this bill. If he is correct in either of these propositions, the pending bill is unconstitutional, and the attempt thus to regulate interstate commerce will end in dismal failure.

It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States has never decided that Congress possesses the power to fix rates. Neither has it decided that if it possesses this power it can call to its assistance a commission to assist in making rates. The reason that the Supreme Court has never passed upon this question is that it never has been presented to it, for Congress has not, as the Senator says, attempted to fix rates for the transportation of freight and passengers. Neither has it attempted to confer such power on a commission.

THIS BILL FIRST ATTEMPT BY CONGRESS TO FIX RAILROAD RATES.

If this bill becomes a law it will be the first time that Congress has assumed to exercise such power, either directly or through a commission. I believe that Congress, under the powers granted to it in the Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes, has the same authority and power over interstate commerce that a State has over commerce carried on wholly within its borders. If a State, under its sovereign power to control commerce within its limits, has the power to fix rates directly by the legislature or through the medium of a commission, then I believe that Congress has the same power in its regulation of interstate commerce to fix rates directly or with the assistance of a commission.

The Senator from Ohio quoted the statement of Mr. Justice Harlan in the Northern Securities case (193 U. S., 342), that the court expressed no opinion upon the question as to whether Congress had the power to fix rates for the reason that Congress had not chosen to exercise its power in that way or to that extent. In the same case, however, Justice Harlan said:

> Is there, then, any escape from the conclusion that, subject only to such restrictions—

Referring to the restrictions in the Constitution—

> the power of Congress over interstate and international commerce is as full and complete as is the power of any State over its domestic commerce?

In the same case Mr. Justice White, speaking for himself and three other justices, said:

> The plenary authority of Congress over interstate commerce, its right to regulate it to the fullest extent, to fix the rates to be charged for the movement of interstate commerce, to legislate concerning the ways and vehicles actually engaged in such traffic, and to exert any and every other power over such commerce which flows from the authority conferred by the Constitution, is thus conceded.

Mr. Justice Jackson also said (Kentucky v. The Indiana Bridge Company, 37 Federal, 567):

> Possessing such sovereign and exclusive power over the subject of commerce among the States, it is difficult to understand why Congress may not legislate in respect thereto to the same extent both as to rates and all other matters as the States may do in respect to purely local or internal commerce.

Many other cases might be cited, all following the doctrine in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 197):

> The power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

It has been decided that the power of Congress over commerce among the Indian tribes includes the power to prohibit the commerce entirely. Its power over foreign commerce is the same as over commerce among the States, and the Supreme Court has decided that Congress has the power to prohibit foreign commerce. Its power over interstate commerce was decided in the Lottery case (188 U. S., 321) to be plenary and unrestricted, except by the limitations in the Constitution, and it was there decided that the word "regulate" included "prohibit." The same doctrine was announced in the case In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545).

CONGRESS CAN DO WHAT STATES HAVE DONE.

In the light of these decisions there is no escape from the conclusion that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is as full and complete as the power of a State over its domestic commerce. If a State has the power to fix rates by its legislature direct or through the instrumentality of a commission, then Congress has the same power.

Following the doctrine of the decisions to which I have referred, I believe that Congress possesses the power to fix rates the same as a State. But we are not left wholly to conjecture, for when the Maximum Rate case (167 U. S., 479) was considered by the Supreme Court, the question in that case being whether Congress in fact had conferred the rate-making power upon the Commission, Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said:

There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates; or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty; or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable.

The court decided that Congress had left to the carriers the right to fix rates. It held that there was nothing in the interstate-commerce act that could be construed so as to imply that Congress had conferred the rate-making power upon the Commission; but there is nothing in the opinion from first to last that even intimates that Congress could not confer such power on a Commission, if it saw fit to do so. This bill seeks to impose that additional duty upon the Commission, under certain limitations and restrictions, and I believe that under the decisions of the Supreme Court Congress has the power to do this if it decides that it is for the best interests of the public to take such a course. That the fixing of rates is a legislative function has been the settled doctrine of the Supreme Court ever since the case of Munn v. Illinois, but it must not be taken from this that rates so fixed can not be inquired into by the courts.

THE EXTENT OF JUDICIAL REVIEW OF LAW-MADE RATES.

It is very interesting to trace the development of the doctrine of judicial interference with law-made rates and to show how far and to what extent the courts will interfere with the rate made by a legislature direct or through the assistance of a commission. It was assumed shortly after the case of Munn v. Illinois was decided that the courts could not be invoked to inquire into or consider any question relating to law-made rates, but this position was soon shown to be untenable by the later decisions of the Supreme Court, in which the case of Munn v. Illinois was construed.

In the Schottler case (110 U. S., 354) Chief Justice Waite, who had written the opinion in the Munn case, referred to that case and said that, following that case, the Government had the power to regulate the price at which water should be sold by one who enjoys a virtual monopoly of the sale. Then, referring to the Munn case, he said:

As was said in that case, such regulations do not deprive a person of his property without due process of law. What may be done if the municipal authorities do not exercise an honest judgment, or if they fix upon a price which is manifestly unreasonable, need not now be considered, for that proposition is not presented by this record. The objection here is not to any improper prices fixed by the officers, but to their power to fix prices at all.

It was clearly decided that the right of the legislature to fix maximum charges was the power decided in the case of Munn v. Illinois. Justice Miller in the Wabash case (118 U. S., 569), referring to the case of Munn v. Illinois and the other cases decided at the same term, after discussing in detail the questions presented in these cases, said:

And the great question to be decided, and which was decided, and which was argued in all those cases, was the right of the State within which a railroad company did business to regulate or limit the amount of any of these traffic charges.

There was in this case no determination of the extent of the control by the legislature, but only as to the power to fix maximum charges. The question was again before the court in the Railroad Commission cases. (116 U. S., 331.) The right of the legislature to fix railroad rates through the instrumentality of a commission was then determined, but Chief Justice Waite went even further in determining the limitations of the power of the legislature than he did in the Schottler case. In the Commission cases he said:

From what has thus been said, it is not to be inferred that this power of limitation or regulation is itself without limit. This power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and limitation is not the equivalent of confiscation. Under pretense of regulating fares and freights, the State can not require a railroad corporation to carry persons or property without reward; neither can it do that which in law amounts to a taking of private property for public use without just compensation, or without due process of law.

This case was decided in 1885, and while it was not necessary to the decision of the question in that case, for, as the court said, the railway commission of Mississippi had not yet fixed a tariff of rates, although its power to do so was affirmed by the court, yet these words of Chief Justice Waite, defining the limitations of the powers of the legislature in fixing rates and deciding to what extent the courts would interfere with such rates, has become the settled doctrine of the jurisprudence of this country, as determined by the Supreme Court.

THE MINNESOTA MILK CASE.

I might refer to other decisions in which the same doctrine was announced, but the question was clearly and definitely settled in the Minnesota Milk case (134 U. S., 459). In that case the railway commission of Minnesota having fixed a certain rate for the transportation of milk, which was not complied with by the carriers, the commission brought a mandamus proceeding in the supreme court of Minnesota to compel the carriers to observe the rates made by the commission. The railroad company in its return to the alternative writ alleged that the rates fixed by the commission amounted to a taking of property without due process of law and that the rate was not a reasonable fare or just compensation to the company for the service rendered. The carriers asked for the privilege of introducing evidence to prove the allegations of its return, but the supreme court of Minnesota denied the application to introduce testimony in proof of the allegations and rendered judgment against the carrier. The case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was there determined that if the statute of Minnesota, as construed by the supreme court of that State, prevented an inquiry in court upon the question as to whether its property was being taken without due process of law, then the statute was void, for it was determined that a hearing before the commission upon this question was not due process of law, but that a carrier was entitled to have that question tried in a court of justice. Justice Miller, in his concurring opinion in that case, laid down several propositions that are good to-day and have been followed by the Supreme Court since that time. After deciding that the State has the legislative power to establish the rates of compensation for carriage of property and that the legislature could exercise that power through a commission, he said:

Neither the legislature nor such commission acting under the authority of the legislature, can establish arbitrarily and without regard to justice and right a tariff of rates for such transportation, which is so unreasonable as to practically destroy the value of property of persons engaged in the carrying business on the one hand, nor so exorbitant and extravagant as to be in utter disregard of the rights of the public for the use of such transportation on the other.

He then said that in either of these classes of cases there was an ultimate relief in the courts, and especially in the courts of the United States when the tariff of rates fixed either by the legislature or by the commission is such as to deprive a party of his property without due process of law. He also said that until the judiciary was appealed to, the tariff of rates, so fixed, was the law of the land and must be submitted to, both by the carrier and the party with whom he deals. These propositions, so clearly and forcibly announced by Justice Miller, agreeing as they do with the statements of Chief Justice Waite, in the cases to which I have referred, have been followed by the Supreme Court, and are the law to-day unmodified, and neither restricted nor enlarged by the later decisions. A carrier can not get relief in a court of justice by simply showing that the rate fixed by the legislature or commission is unreasonable, but it must show that the rate is so unreasonable and so unjust as to amount to a taking of its property for a public use without just compensation. Justice Blatchford, who delivered the opinion in the Minnesota Milk case, also delivered the opinion in the case of Budd v. New York (143 U. S., 517), and explained in detail the scope and extent of that decision.

JUSTICES HARLAN, BREWER, AND BROWN ON EXTENT OF JUDICIAL INTERFERENCE.

Justice Harlan, in the Land Company case (174 U. S., 751), clearly defines the extent of judicial interference with rates fixed by law, either by a legislature direct or through the assistance of a commission. He says:

But it should also be remembered that the judiciary ought not to interfere with the collection of rates established under legislative sanction unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable as to make their enforcement equivalent to the taking of property for public use without such compensation as under all the circumstances is just both to the owner and to the public; that is, judicial interference should never occur unless the case presents, clearly and beyond all doubt, such a flagrant attack upon the rights of property under the guise of regulations as to compel the court to say that the rates prescribed will necessarily have the effect to deny just compensation for private property taken for the public use.

The Kansas City Stock Yards case (183 U. S., 91) contains a clear and able discussion of the law as defined by the Supreme Court, this case being decided in November, 1901. Justice Brewer, discussing all the leading decisions of the court upon these questions, and after quoting the words of Justice Harlan, to which I have just referred, makes this statement:

As to parties engaged in performing a public service, while the power to regulate has been sustained, negatively the court has held that the legislature may not prescribe rates which, if enforced, would amount to a confiscation of property. But it has not held affirmatively that the legislature may enforce rates which stop only this side of confiscation and leave the property in the hands and under the care of the owners without any remuneration for its use. It has declared that the present value of the property is the basis by which the test of reasonableness is to be determined, although the actual cost is to be considered, and that the value of the services rendered to each individual is also to be considered. It has also ruled that the determination of the legislature is to be presumed to be just, and must be upheld unless it clearly appears to result in enforcing unreasonable and unjust rates.

In a still later decision of the court (186 U. S., 268), affirming the supreme court of the Minnesota in sustaining the order of the railway commission of Minnesota fixing rates on coal in carload lots, Justice Brown says:

It is sufficient, however, for the purpose of this case to say that the action of the commission in fixing the rate complained of as to this particular class of freight has not been shown to be so unjust or unreasonable as to amount to a taking of property without due process of law, and we therefore conclude that the judgment of the Supreme Court must be affirmed.

WHAT THE COURTS WILL DO IF THEIR JURISDICTION IS NOT ENLARGED.

It is clearly shown by these decisions, to which many more might be added, that unless there is something inserted in this bill enlarging the present jurisdiction of the courts over rates made by legislative authority, that the courts will only interfere and set aside such rates when they are confiscatory, and they have decided that rates are confiscatory when they do not afford a fair return on the property that is employed in performing the public service. The rates can not be fixed so low by the legislature that they leave the property in the hands and under the care of the owners without any remuneration for its use. They have declared that the present value of the property is the basis by which to test the question as to whether there is a fair return on the property employed, although the actual cost is to be considered.

But this view of the law as determined by the Supreme Court is well understood, and it was probably unnecessary for me to consider this phase of the question so much in detail. I would not have done so were it not for the effort that is being made to amend this bill so as to change this procedure and impose upon the courts additional duties by seeking to enlarge the jurisdiction which they now assume over rates made by legislative authority.

It has been stated that the supporters of this bill favor restricting the review by the courts of rates made by Congress with the assistance of the Commission. Those who favor this bill wish to leave the jurisdiction of the courts in relation to such rates just as it is to-day, as defined by the decisions of the Supreme Court. There are those who wish to amend this bill so as to enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts and ask them to consider questions in relation to rates made by legislative authority that so far they have declined to consider, when rates made by State legislatures, with the assistance of State commissions have been the subject of consideration by the Supreme Court.

THE BILL NOW RECOGNIZES THE RIGHT OF REVIEW.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in the very able and instructive speech which he made the other day in the Senate, said:

I have contended that a law authorizing a commission to set aside rates and practices upon complaint, and to substitute others in their stead, must proceed either upon the theory of the commission's action being final, or upon the theory that it must be subjected to review in the courts.

He further said, after referring to the provisions in the bill which recognize that a court may suspend or set aside an order of the Commission:

One of two things is certain, either the bill does or it does not provide for a review. If it does not provide for review, and if those in favor of the bill as it now stands do not contemplate or desire a review, then, in all fairness, these provisions should be stricken from the bill.

The fact is, however, as I have already shown, that the friends of the bill as it now stands claim, not that it does not contemplate a review, but that the bill either sufficiently provides for a review, or recognizes a right claimed to exist independently of the bill.

Certainly no one at this late day would attempt to draw a bill seeking to make the orders of the Commission final. There are too many decisions of the Supreme Court holding that such orders can not be made final, beyond the power of the court to inquire into certain questions decided by the Commission. The Senator is right when he says that the friends of this bill do not claim that it does not contemplate a review, but they contend that the bill now sufficiently provides for a review and recognizes that the right of review exists independently of this bill. If the provisions referred to by the Senator were stricken from the bill, it might be contended that it was the intention of Congress to make the orders of the Commission final, and if the bill could be so construed there would be no question of its invalidity. The bill provides that its orders, except for the payment of money, shall go into effect within thirty days unless the same shall be suspended, modified, or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

ORDERS OF COMMISSION CAN NOT BE MADE FINAL.

The bill thus recognizes the power of a court of competent jurisdiction to suspend or set aside the orders of the Commission. This bill was drawn upon the theory that it was not within the power of Congress to make the orders of the Commission final beyond the right of the courts to inquire into whether the Commission had exceeded its authority or made rates so low that they were confiscatory.

It was once contended that the legislature did have the authority to make its rates final and to provide that those made by a commission were conclusive and could not be inquired into or set aside by a court. This contention is no longer tenable, as it is now admitted by all that while it is a legislative function to fix a future rate, which may be done either by the legislature or through the assistance of a commission, yet it is a judicial function to inquire into and ascertain whether rates fixed, by a legislature or by a commission under the authority and direction of the legislature, are so unjust and so unreasonable as to amount to a taking of property without just compensation.

A CONTROVERSY OVER KIND AND EXTENT OF REVIEW.

This is not a question between a review and no review, but it is a question of the kind and extent of the review. I am not here to take the inconsistent position that while I believe provisions for review are in the bill yet I am unwilling in language to express such a review by an appropriate amendment. The Senator suggests that no suit can be brought against the Interstate Commerce Commission because no authority is given in the bill to sue the Commission. The venue of all suits is clearly defined, and it was no doubt the theory of the framers of the bill that the right of the carrier to sue the Commission for an injury under an order made by the Commission is clear and undoubted. They no doubt came to this conclusion from an examination of the Reagan case (154 U. S., 362) and the Smyth v. Ames case (169 U. S., 466). In both of these cases the constitutionality of the laws attacked were sustained by the Supreme Court, but in each case it was decided that the Commission had acted beyond its authority. While the Nebraska law authorized a suit to be brought in the courts of Nebraska to challenge the order of the board, yet the suit that was brought (Smyth v. Ames) was a suit in equity in the United States court, which disregarded entirely the provisions for review by the statute. But I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that there should be no question in regard to the right of a carrier that has been injured by an order of the Commission to sue the Commission in the United States circuit court.

FAVORS AN AMENDMENT FOR COURT REVIEW.

I do not object to an amendment authorizing suit to be brought against the Commission and conferring jurisdiction upon the United States circuit court sitting in equity to hear and determine any such suit. I believe under this bill without amendment that two questions can be inquired into by the court in a suit brought by the carrier or anyone else injured by an order of the Commission, and I am not opposed to amending the bill by defining such jurisdiction of the court. I believe that suit can be brought to set aside the order of the Commission when the Commission has acted beyond its authority, for general unlimited jurisdiction is not conferred upon the Commission to make rates. It is a body of limited jurisdiction, and the law clearly defines its duties, and it must act within the law or its actions are void. I also believe that under this bill, without amendment, if the Commission makes an order that is a violation of the rights of the carrier, which are secured by the Constitution, the court, on a suit being brought, will suspend or set aside such order; and believing that these things are in the bill now I am not opposed to making the bill clear and definite by inserting such provisions. And so, though satisfied with the House bill in this particular and having no doubt of its constitutionality, but reposing confidence in the great legal ability of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and other Senators who hold similar views to those which he expressed, I am willing, in order to remove all question as to the constitutionality of this bill, in order to make it plain that there is no intention to make the orders of the Commission final, to put in an amendment providing that suits may be brought in the United States circuit court against the Commission to set aside any order of the Commission and the orders may be suspended or set aside when it appears that the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission to make or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution. The amendment I have offered, and which has been read, is in line with this suggestion.

FEAR SUCH AN AMENDMENT WOULD NOT BE SATISFACTORY.

But I fear that this amendment will not be satisfactory to the Senator from Pennsylvania and the other Senators who are seeking to amend this bill by inserting a provision for a court review. It is not the intention of those who are insisting upon a review to insert a provision to limit the jurisdiction of the courts to the two questions suggested in this amendment. They know that the courts would assume this jurisdiction now, for they have assumed it in cases arising under State statutes and have clearly defined the length to which the courts will go in examining the orders of a subordinate tribunal. If the Commission has acted within its authority in making the order, then the rate will only be set aside by a court if it is so unreasonably low as to amount to confiscation, and a confiscatory rate has been defined to be one that does not give a fair return on the property that is employed in performing the service. What is a fair return is a judicial question which the courts will determine.

To show the kind of a review that is sought to be placed in this bill, I wish to refer to the statements of a friend of the bill, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and an opponent of the bill, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in his very able speech showing the folly and unwisdom of attempting to make rates by law, but in which he announced his willingness to support this bill, which does what he so eloquently condemned, said that he would favor it provided there was a provision placed in it for review by the courts, not only as to whether the rate is confiscatory, but also as to whether it is just and reasonable. He said:

Finally, there should be ample provision for appeal to—or, more properly, a review by—courts of competent jurisdiction sitting in equity, not only as to whether the rate is confiscatory, but also whether it is just and reasonable, and an arrangement should be made by law for the rapid disposition of all such cases.

The Senator from Ohio said:

The making of a rate is a legislative act, and legislative discretion of the Commission in determining what is a reasonable rate can not be interfered with by the courts in the absence of special statutory authority, unless the rate be fixed so high that it is extortionate to the shipper, or so low that it is confiscatory as to the carrier.

He further said:

But between extortion on the one hand, and confiscation on the other, there is, in most cases, a considerable latitude within which the action of the Commission, without special statutory provision for review of it by the courts, would be final and conclusive.

I believe that if we have a commission to which Congress gives the authority to fix maximum rates under certain restrictions, it is the duty of that commission to exercise its judgment as to the limit to be fixed, and that judgment when once exercised should not be controlled or revised by a court on review, if the commission acted within its authority, unless the rate is fixed so high as to be extortionate to the shipper, or so low as to be confiscatory to the carrier.

THE TWO KINDS OF COURT REVIEW.

The issue here could not be more clearly defined than by comparing the statements of these two Senators as to what they desire placed in the bill with the amendment which I have offered. A confiscatory rate is not solely one that leaves the property in the hands of the owner without any return for its use, but a rate is confiscatory unless it will afford a fair return on the property employed in the service. This bill provides that the rate must be fairly remunerative, and the fifth amendment to the Constitution provides that private property can not be taken for a public use without just compensation.

But what the Senators from Massachusetts and Ohio desire, and what the Senator from Pennsylvania desires, if we take the provisions for court review in the document which he had printed, is to place in this bill provisions that will authorize the court to sit in judgment on the wisdom and policy of the rates made by the Commission and suspend or set them aside, not only when they are confiscatory, but when for other reasons they deem them unwise or unfair. Some of the provisions referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, in the document to which I have referred, have been passed upon by the supreme courts of the respective States. These provisions are all similar. They all give to the court the very widest latitude and jurisdiction in considering orders of the Commission, and they are so nearly alike that one might believe that they had emanated from a common source. No provision is broader than that of the statute of Minnesota, which authorizes the court, in considering an order of the Commission, to examine the whole matter in controversy, including matters of fact, as well as questions of law, and to affirm, modify, or reverse such order in whole or in part, as justice may require.

WHAT THE SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA DECIDED.

The supreme court of Minnesota (69 Minn., 375), in passing upon this provision, said that the courts did not have authority to fix rates, to substitute their judgment for the judgment of the commission, and that the court could not place itself in the shoes of the commission and try de novo the question of what are reasonable rates; that upon appeal under this statute the court could review the acts of the commission only so far as to determine whether the rates fixed by it were confiscatory. The question was whether the court should assume this broad jurisdiction, or whether it should follow the precedents laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the absence of any statutory provision for review. Judge Canty, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

If by this the legislature intended to provide that the court should put itself in the place of the commission, try the matter de novo and determine what are reasonable rates, without regard to the findings of the commission, such intent can not be carried out, as the statute which so provided would be unconstitutional. The fixing of rates is a legislative or administrative act, not a judicial one.

He further said:

While the district court takes the evidence de novo, it can not put itself in the place of the commission, and try the facts in controversy de novo. The district court can review the findings of the commission only so far as to determine whether or not the rates fixed are so unreasonable as to be confiscatory, just as an appellate court reviews the verdict of the jury for the purpose of determining whether it is so excessive that it can not stand.

Judge Mitchell, who also concurred in the decision, made the following statement in his opinion:

It must now be accepted as the settled law that, when rates or charges by railway companies have been fixed by the legislature or a commission, the determination of the question whether such rates are "reasonable" or "unreasonable" is a judicial function. But this is so, not because the fixing of rates is a judicial function (for all the authorities agree that it is a legislative one), but solely by virtue of the constitutional guaranty that no one shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. Therefore the only function of the courts is to determine whether the rates fixed violate this constitutional principle.

Courts should be very slow to interfere with the deliberate judgment of the legislature or a legislative commission in the exercise of what is confessedly a legislative or administrative function. To warrant such interference, it should clearly appear that the rates fixed are so grossly inadequate as to be confiscatory, and hence in violation of the Constitution. It is not enough to justify a court in holding a rate "unreasonable," and hence unconstitutional, that, if it was its province to fix rates, it would, in its judgment, have fixed them somewhat higher. Any such doctrine would result, in effect, in transferring the power of fixing rates from the legislature to the courts, and making it a judicial and not a legislative function. When there is room for a reasonable difference of opinion, in the exercise of an honest and intelligent judgment, as to the reasonableness of a rate, the courts have no right to set up their judgment against that of the legislature or of a legislative commission. In my opinion, it is only when a rate is manifestly so grossly inadequate that it could not have been fixed in the exercise of an honest and intelligent judgment that the courts have any right to declare it to be confiscatory.

So the supreme court of Minnesota declined, although directed by statute, to assume the rate-making function, and limited its inquiry into the question as to whether or not the rates were so low as to be confiscatory. The Supreme Court of the United States, on appeal from a judgment of the supreme court of Minnesota in a similar case to this (186 U. S., 257), took the same position, and confined its investigations to the question as to whether the rates fixed by the Minnesota commission were so unreasonably low as to amount to a taking of the property of the carrier without just compensation.

THE SUPREME COURT OF TEXAS TAKES A DIFFERENT VIEW.

But the supreme court of Texas, in the Railway Commission case (90 Tex. Rep., 353), construed differently the provision in the railroad-commission law of Texas. After referring to article 4565, set out in full in the document referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the court considered the following article, 4566:

In all trials under the foregoing article the burden of proof shall rest upon the plaintiff, who must show by clear and satisfactory evidence that the rates, regulation, order, classification, act or charges complained of are unreasonable and unjust to it or them.

The court then says:

It is claimed by the Attorney-General on behalf of the railroad commission, that the courts have no power under this law to review the action of the railroad commissioners in regard to any of the matters enumerated unless the complainant shall show that the act complained of amounts to a taking of property without proper compensation or without due process of law, and in support of this position it is asserted that prior to the enactment of this law the words "unreasonable and unjust," when used in reference to the action of legislative bodies and of commissions created by them, had received the interpretation that such acts must be unreasonable and unjust to the extent of being violative of the Constitution, and that the words "unreasonable and unjust" must be so construed because it will be presumed that the legislature used them in that sense. We know of no decision of any court which has defined either "unreasonable" or "unjust" to mean that the act so characterized is the taking of property without proper compensation or without due process of law.

I wish to call the special attention of Senators to this part of the decision of the supreme court of Texas:

It is true that the courts have established the rule that the reasonableness and justice of rates fixed by the legislature, or by a commission empowered by it so to do, are ordinarily questions committed to the discretion of those bodies, and not subject to revision by the courts, but in such cases the law did not authorize any revision of such action by the judicial department.

I desire to call the attention of Senators to this, showing that the decision of the supreme court of Texas and the jurisdiction which they assumed was by reason of the insertion in the provision for court review of the words that "they may prove that the charges are unjust and unreasonable to it or them."

The court then said that the courts, acting under the general rule, did not revise the exercise of discretionary power on the part of the legislature or the commission, but only protected parties against a violation of the constitution. The court said the question in this case was whether the statute quoted had changed the law, and if it had not, the same test would be applied. After discussing the facts of the case, the court said that it was evidently the intention of the legislature to establish a much more liberal rule than previously existed on this subject. The court then says:

The language of the law is so antagonistic to the rule established by the decisions, which construction is claimed to have been adopted by the legislature, that we must conclude that the legislature intended to change those rules in their application to the subjects embraced in the articles quoted, otherwise there was no need for the articles 4565 and 4566. Indeed, the conferring of that jurisdiction upon the courts of itself imposed the duty to try the case by the ordinary rules of procedure, unless otherwise provided. The attorney-general urges the inconveniences of such a rule and the possibility of blocking the business of the commission by such proceedings. It may not be a wise policy to extend this liberality to those who are affected by the exercise of the powers conferred upon the commission, but that question is for the legislative branch of the government, and not for the courts, to deal with.

It will thus be seen that the supreme court of Texas, under a statutory provision that permits the court on review to determine the justness and reasonableness of the rates fixed by the commission, held that the effect of this statute is to change the rule laid down by the courts that they will only set aside the order of the commission when the rate is so unreasonably low or so manifestly unjust as to amount to a confiscation of the property of the carrier. This case has been followed in Railroad Commission case (96 Texas, 394).

THE KANSAS COURT OF VISITATION CASE.

In 1898 an act was passed by the legislature of the State of Kansas creating a court of visitation. That act was considered by the United States circuit court in the case of the Western Union Telegraph Company v. Myatt (98 Fed. Rep., 335), and by the Kansas supreme court in the case of State v. Johnson (61 Kans., 803). The court created by the legislature was inferior to the supreme court, and there is a provision in our constitution authorizing the legislature to create courts inferior to the supreme court. Provision was made in the act for a full review of the decisions of the court by the supreme court, but the attempt was made in this legislation to confer upon this judicial tribunal the power to fix rates and the power to perform the usual functions performed by a board of railroad commissioners.

Full jurisdiction and authority was given to this court to hear complaints in regard to rates, to fix rates when it found that the rates of the carrier were unreasonable and unjust, and to perform the functions and powers usually performed by a board of railroad commissioners. At the same session of the legislature the law which had provided for a board of railroad commissioners and which had been upon the statute books for many years was repealed, showing clearly that it was the intention of the legislature to confer all powers and supervision in the fixing of rates on the court of visitation. The act was first considered in a suit brought in the United States circuit court, involving as it did the fixing of telegraph charges, and it was declared unconstitutional because of the intermingling of judicial, executive, and legislative functions in a very able decision by Judge Hook, now United States circuit judge. The supreme court of Kansas took the same position, that it was not within the power of the legislature to confer the rate-making power upon a judicial tribunal (61 Kans., 820). It was said in that case:

The rate-making power, being essentially legislative in its nature, whether exercised directly by the legislature or delegated by it to a competent board or commission, can no more be imposed on or exercised by the judicial department than can the pardoning power of the governor or any other distinctively executive function. It is a cardinal principle of representative government that the making of laws and rules regulating the future conduct and fixing the rights of parties belongs to the legislative department—a power which can never be reposed in or exercised by the judiciary.

It was further said:

Counsel for petitioner do not seem to question the rule that the establishment of freight rates is a legislative prerogative. Yet, as we understand them, they contend that this establishment may be accomplished through the decrees of a judicial tribunal in furtherance of and incidental to granted power to determine what are reasonable rates. In other words, admitting that to decide what is a reasonable rate is a judicial power, they argue that when a court determines this it may proclaim its findings in respect thereto, and this declaration is binding not only upon parties to the inquiry, but upon all other parties who may thereafter be affected.

This decision has peculiar application and relation to the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER].

Conceding that courts can not legislate, they insist that courts may do that which, in legal effect, is nothing more or less than legislation. It is one thing to determine whether a freight rate is reasonable in a controversy between a shipper and a carrier, and another thing to decide, at the suit of the State or a private party, what shall be charged in the future for such services. A decision made in the first case might be a precedent when a similar controversy subsequently arose; but the promulgation of the first decision, however formally done by a judicial tribunal, could not have the far-reaching effect of a legislative act, for it is peculiarly within the province of the legislature to regulate future conduct. Chief Justice Marshall said: "The legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes the law."

COOLEY AND SUPREME COURTS OF NEBRASKA, CONNECTICUT, AND LOUISIANA ON JUDICIAL LIMITATIONS.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 168, makes the following distinction between legislative and judicial power:

The difference between the departments undoubtedly is, that "the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes the law." And it is said that that which distinguishes a judicial from a legislative act is, that the one is a determination of what the existing law is in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be for the regulation of all future cases falling under its provisions.

In the case of Nebraska Telephone Company v. State, the supreme court of Nebraska (55 Nebr., 627) said:

Where a public-service corporation has performed a service and sues to recover therefor, in the absence of an express contract for a specific compensation the measure of its damages is a reasonable compensation for the services performed; and whether the compensation which it demands is reasonable is a judicial question. Where the legislature has fixed the compensation which a public-service corporation may exact for the performance of a service, then the reasonableness of the compensation so fixed by the legislature—that is, whether the limiting of the corporation to the compensation fixed by the statute would result in a confiscation of the corporation's property—is a judicial question (Smyth v. Ames). But the power—the jurisdiction—to determine what compensation a public-service corporation may exact for service to be rendered by it we understand to be a legislative, and not a judicial, function.

In the case of The Norwalk Street Railway Company's appeal (69 Conn., 597) the court said:

This distinction is illustrated in the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, dealing with legislative regulations of charges by railroad companies. The regulation of such charges is held to be distinctively a legislative function which may be delegated by the legislature to a subordinate legislative or administrative body, but if this subordinate body or the legislature exceeds its powers and a person is thereby injured in his rights of property, he may invoke the judicial power to determine that question of legal injury; and the reasonableness of the charges, although a question legislative in its nature, must be reviewed by the court as necessarily incident to the exercise of its judicial power. But if the court should attempt to establish for the future a schedule of charges, it would exceed the limits of judicial power; it would act as legislator in respect to a matter as to which it must also act as judge.

I refer also to a decision of the supreme court of Louisiana in the Railway Commission case. (109 La. Rep., 263.) In discussing what the court should do in an action brought to review an order of the commission, it said:

That is a matter submitted to the judgment of the commission, not that of the railroad or of this court, unless the selection trenches upon the legal rights of the railroad corporation. The mere reference of disputed issues between the parties to this court for adjudication was not intended to constitute it an "administrative" board, revisory in character over the orders and conclusions of the commission. Our action is judicial, not administrative. It was not intended that we should substitute our judgment for that of the commission every time there is a dispute touching the particular place on the line of railroad where it would be best for the public interest that a station or a depot should be placed. To come successfully before this court, the appellant must be able to point out some legal right of its own which has been infringed upon.

DECISIONS ON COURT REVIEW DO NOT AGREE.

So the decisions of the courts on the different provisions for court review collected by the Senator from Pennsylvania are at variance, different courts construing practically the same statute in an entirely different way. I call the attention of the Senate to these decisions to show the necessity for the use of great care and caution in the wording of a provision for review, for it may affect the constitutionality of this whole measure.

Early in the session the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] introduced a bill imposing the duty of fixing rates on the courts in conjunction with Congress. That bill has so far not received serious consideration in the Senate, and up to date no support has been tendered it aside from the nurturing watch care of the Senator from Ohio.

But there is a disposition in some quarters, and especially in the literature that has been rained down upon the members of this Senate for weeks and weeks, to take the position that this question of the regulation of rates is not one, after all, for Congress to exercise, either directly or through the instrumentality of a commission; that while the Commission under this law will fix the limit beyond which the carrier can not go in fixing rates for the future, yet in some way and in some manner, by providing for a particular kind of review, that the whole controversy can be transferred to the courts, which will finally determine the limit of rates which shall be fixed. And so it has been suggested that a provision should be incorporated in this bill providing for a review by the courts. I will favor such a provision provided that there is no attempt or suggestion in it to transfer to the courts powers that are clearly legislative and administrative. I object to any plan which proposes to confer the rate-making power on the courts, either directly or indirectly, for such power is confided to Congress and not to the courts, and the courts should not discharge the power even if it is attempted to be conferred by statute. The jurisdiction of the courts affecting orders made by the Commission has been defined in the past, and the power of Congress to enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts has been discussed by experts in railroad law in the hearings to which I shall now refer.

But before I read these statements, which may be found in the hearings, I want to refer to the admirable speech of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] made yesterday. I see nothing that can be added to it, for it clearly states this whole proposition. The question of regulating interstate-commerce rates is a power that is conferred upon Congress, as is shown by the speech of the Senator from Minnesota. It is in no respect conferred upon the courts, and they can not assume it directly, as proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], or indirectly, as is proposed in the provisions for review in the document which has been prepared and printed at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to throw out the suggestion that I am responsible for anything contained in that document?

Mr. LONG. Not at all. I simply referred to the document.

Mr. KNOX. That document is merely a transcript of the legislation of the various States to which it refers.

Mr. LONG. Certainly. Neither do I wish to imply that the Senator desires a review that will impose upon the court the function of fixing rates.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. In reply to that, if I may say just a word, I will state that I do not know of anyone in the Senate who is contending for such a provision.

Mr. LONG. I am endeavoring to prove to the Senate, and especially to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that if a provision is inserted in this bill similar to the provisions which are contained in the document which he had printed, it will result in conferring the rate-making function on the courts by review.

I will now refer to the opinions found in the hearings by gentlemen, who, while they may not be as great constitutional lawyers as there are in the Senate, yet certainly on this question of the law in relation to railroads, their opinions are entitled to great consideration. It is their business to guide the operations of great corporations, to determine questions affecting those corporations, and I now want to refer to their opinions as to what can be done by Congress in conferring jurisdiction on the courts to review the orders of the Commission.

VIEWS OF VICTOR MORAWETZ.

Mr. Victor Morawetz, general counsel of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, in the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, Volume II, page 801, said:

Congress can not vest in the courts power to fix future rates or to consider and pass upon the wisdom or policy of the Commission in prescribing a particular rate which is neither confiscatory nor unreasonably high. It is well settled that Congress can not constitutionally require the courts of the United States to perform any duties that are not of a judicial character. Congress can not require the courts, directly or indirectly, to perform duties of an administrative or of a quasi legislative character.

He further said:

Congress can require the courts to pass upon the question whether a rate fixed by a commission is confiscatory. It can also require the courts to determine whether a rate fixed by a commission or by a railway company is excessive—illegally high. But Congress can not require the courts to pass upon the mere business policy of fixing a rate anywhere between those two extremes.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], in his speech, from which I have quoted, says that he wants a special statutory authority authorizing the courts to consider something in relation to a rate aside from the question whether it is unreasonably high, and therefore extortionate to the shipper, and a rate that is unreasonably low, and therefore confiscatory as to the carrier. Mr. Morawetz, in his statement, says that Congress can not confer upon the courts the power to decide anything between these two extremes.

He further said:

This precise question has never been decided nor considered by the Supreme Court, because it never arose. Congress never attempted to do such a thing. But a similar question has arisen under State legislation purporting to vest the rate-making power in the courts and this legislation has been condemned as unconstitutional.

In State v. Johnson (61 Kans., 803) the supreme court of Kansas decided that the act of the legislature of that State creating a court called the "court of visitation" was unconstitutional, for the reason that it conferred upon this court the power of prescribing the future rates for railway companies, that being a legislative and not a judicial function. The same conclusion was reached when the validity of this Kansas law was considered by the circuit court of the United States in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Myatt (98 Fed. Rep., 335). (See also Nebraska Telegraph Co. v. State, 55 Nebr., 627.)

He further said:

It is clear, however, that if Congress can not give to the courts original power to prescribe what rates the railway carriers shall charge, Congress can not require the courts to do this indirectly, by requiring them to reconsider the wisdom and policy of the Commission in fixing a rate. In other words, Congress can not make the court in effect an appellate railway commission to sit in review of the actions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to hear de novo the questions passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission and to substitute the ideas of the court as to the wisdom and policy of a particular rate for the ideas of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Any statute authorizing a commission in the first instance to exercise purely discretionary power in fixing rates and requiring the courts to review this discretion of the Commission would be unconstitutional, because the discretion to be reviewed by the courts would be a legislative discretion and not a legal discretion. It is obvious that such a statute would indirectly make the courts the rate makers for all the railways in the United States, because a decision of the Commission or the action of the Commission in fixing a rate would in no case be final. Either party could ask the court to reconsider the whole question as it was considered by the Commission and substitute its ideas of the wisdom and policy for the ideas of the Commission.

The courts undoubtedly can be required to pass upon the question whether a rate prescribed by a commission is unreasonably high, and therefore unlawful. The courts have been required under the existing laws to pass upon the question whether the rate charged by a carrier is unreasonably high and in violation of the provisions of the interstate-commerce act. The courts also can be required to pass upon the question whether the act of a carrier in fixing a rate is in violation of any legal order of the Commission. But they can not be required to substitute their ideas as to the wisdom or policy of fixing a rate between the two extremes of legality which I have mentioned—that is, a rate which is unreasonably high and the rate which is confiscatory.

The Senator from Ohio, in his speech, states the law the same as Mr. Morawetz—that the courts will consider only whether the rate fixed by the Commission is so unreasonably high as to be extortionate to the shipper or so unreasonably low as to be confiscatory to the carrier; but the Senator from Ohio wants a provision in this bill that will permit the court to look into the wisdom and policy of the rate fixed between those two extremes, and Mr. Morawetz says that that jurisdiction can not be conferred upon the courts, because it would in effect be conferring the rate-making power.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. This statement of Mr. Morawetz, to which the Senator refers, is only the giving of an opinion, and it has no binding authority, I suppose. I presume other lawyers would have the privilege of having a different opinion, especially those charged with the performance of the duties.

Mr. LONG. Certainly. Mr. Morawetz probably may not equal some Senators as a constitutional lawyer; but upon this particular question as between Mr. Morawetz, a railroad lawyer, and the Senator from Ohio, a constitutional lawyer, the Senator will pardon me for saying that I would give very great consideration to the opinion of Mr. Morawetz, who has devoted his life to questions relating to railroads, and how their powers can be restricted by legislation. But it is, of course, only his opinion.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know just what it is Mr. Morawetz says, but——

Mr. LONG. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. FORAKER. But the only contention I have made has been that between what was confiscatory and what was extortionate, anything that the Congress might see fit to prescribe would be a lawful rate with which a court could not interfere. That I have said on all occasions. Mr. Morawetz and

I do not differ on that, so far as I know. I have not said anything at any time or any place that was in contradiction of that.

Mr. LONG. Possibly the Senator was not in the Chamber when I read from his speech, in which he defined the kind of review he desired in this bill. As I understand the Senator's language, he wishes a review that will give the court the authority to pass upon the reasonableness of a rate which is between one that is so high as to be extortionate to the shipper and so low as to be confiscatory to the carrier. The Senator wants a provision in the bill that would authorize the court to pass upon such a rate and revise the judgment of the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. And so I do, Mr. President.

Mr. LONG. That is what I thought.

Mr. FORAKER. And not only did I contend for that, but I contended that the court ought to have the power conferred upon it in making this review to determine whether the rate that was condemned as unreasonable was in fact unreasonable, or whether it was a just and reasonable rate that should not have been condemned; and the court should have the power—and it could not have it unless we conferred it upon it—of determining whether or not the rate suggested was between the extremes of confiscatory and extortionate, and, therefore, a reasonable and just rate which the Commission had a right under the command of a statute to prescribe.

Mr. LONG. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think there is much difference between Mr. Morawetz and myself, although I do not remember exactly what Mr. Morawetz said. I remember I was present when he testified, but I do not remember that he said anything that was startling or anything that was in contradiction of any well-accepted ideas among lawyers.

Mr. LONG. I think the last statement of the Senator from Ohio makes it very plain as to what he wants. He wants the court given authority by a provision for review to revise a rate that is somewhere between a rate that is so high that it is extortionate to the shipper and a rate that is so low that it is confiscatory to the carrier, both of which will now be set aside without any special statutory authority. He wants a provision for review authorizing the courts to revise and set aside rates between those two extremes.

Mr. HOPKINS. And a rate that has been set aside also.

Mr. LONG. And the rate of the carrier that has been set aside by the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator only partially states the case. This bill says the rates fixed by the Commission shall be reasonable, just, and fairly remunerative. If it be competent for us to empower a commission to fix rates in that way, it is a command which the Commission shall observe; and so they would be charged with the duty not only of fixing a rate which was between what was extortionate on the one hand and confiscatory on the other, but which, being between either, would also be fairly remunerative. It might be that the rate fixed, to illustrate, would pay but 2 per cent on the value with reference to which the rate was to be computed. It might be held—and I think it would be held by any court—that that was not a fairly remunerative rate. What I want is that the court shall have power not only to determine that a rate is between the extremes of extortion on the one hand and confiscation on the other, but that it is so between the extremes as it will be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative. That will be the command, if we pass this bill, as the Senator insists we shall, with the provision in it to which I have referred that the Congress will lay upon this Commission—and we have a right to know whether or not the Commission to which we have deputed this important power has executed it in accordance with the mandate of Congress.

Mr. LONG. The court has the right to inquire, of course, as to whether the Commission exceeded its authority under the law. It can only act within the law. It has not general rate-making power, and it is a question at all times to determine whether or not it has obeyed the law in fixing the maximum rate. But I suggest to the Senator that the Commission should perform some final function. If we pass this bill it will be the function of that Commission to fix the limit beyond which the carrier can not go in fixing its future rates. I contend, while it is a judicial question to determine whether that limit is so high that it is extortionate to the shipper or so low as to be confiscatory to the carrier, that between those two extremes it is not a judicial question if the Commission follows the law. It is an administrative question that can not be conferred upon any court on review.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is precisely right in the absence of legislation, but if we say to the Commission you shall make a rate that is just and reasonable, which would bring it between the two, and which, in addition, shall be fairly remunerative, that is a command which the Commission must obey. My contention is that the court should have power to review the action of the Commission and determine not simply whether a rate is between the two, confiscatory on the one hand and extortionate on the other, but whether, in addition to being just and reasonable because between the two, it should yet be fairly remunerative. Fairly remunerative is an important part which the Senator wants to overlook, and without——

Mr. LONG. I do not overlook it.

Mr. FORAKER. And without legislation with respect to which no court would have any power to review any action of the Commission.

Mr. LONG. I will say further to the Senator that the rate must be justly compensatory, which is practically the same thing.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator oblige me by telling me what he means by "justly compensatory?"

Mr. LONG. In my opinion, there is no great difference between the words in this bill and the provision in the fifth amendment of the Constitution. The Senator must remember that the word "confiscatory" even, as defined by the Supreme Court, means a fair return on the property that is employed in the performance of the service. So that is a judicial question which the courts will determine and which we can not keep the courts from determining.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator must allow me to interrupt him without complaining, because he has done me the honor of directly addressing himself to me and calling upon me for expressions in return to his suggestions. He uses the language "justly compensatory" as an offset, I suppose, to "fairly remunerative." What I want to know is not what is the constitutional signification, but what, in a practical way, does he mean by a rate that is "justly compensatory?" Does he refer, as I have heard Senators say, to what is a just compensation for the services rendered? Is that what the Senator means by it?

Mr. LONG. That is a question for the court to determine.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, it is a question for the Senate to determine. We are called upon to pass judgment upon it. What is meant by it? Will some Senator tell me?

Mr. LONG. It is a question for the court to determine whether the rate fixed is one that affords a fair return for the services performed. Whether it is on that particular rate or whether it is on that rate in conjunction with all the other business of the carrier is for the court and not for the Senate to determine.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator unduly, but this expression is being employed here from time to time, and I want to find out what Senators who employ that term mean by it—whether they mean that the rate shall represent a just compensation for the services rendered in the transportation of a particular lot of freight from point to point. If that is what the Senator means, then I know what he is talking about. Can the Senator tell me whether or not that is what he means?

Mr. LONG. Later on I will discuss that particular provision in this measure.

Mr. FORAKER. What objection is there, may I ask the Senator, to discussing it now? He has been employing that term, and employing it in his references to myself. He employs it in refutation of something I am quoted as having said at some other time. I do not know how to answer the Senator until I know what he means by the term.

Mr. LONG. It is a judicial question, and it is for the court to determine just what will be considered in determining whether a rate is fairly remunerative. My own opinion is that it is not on the particular rate alone that they will determine whether there has been a fair return. Rates in this country are not based on the cost of the service. They are based more nearly on the value of the service. I believe a rate will be considered in conjunction with other rates to determine whether there has been a fair return for services performed. But this is not the question I was discussing.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator, by his last remarks, has made clear why it is necessary, if we are to have any intelligent discussion in which this term is employed, to have the term defined. It is true, as he says, that rates are generally fixed, according to the way rates have been made heretofore, with reference to the value of the service rendered, rather than with the idea of making a just compensation for the service rendered. The term employed in the Constitution, when it is applied to the taking of private property for public use, involves a valuation of the property with a view to finding out what it is worth and how much is taken, in making whole the person from whom it is taken; and in that there is no element of indefiniteness or speculation. The value of that property is not mixed up with the value of any other property. It is simply, What is the thing that is taken worth? The term "just compensation" was employed in the Constitution with reference, in other words, to the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Now, are we to apply that rule in the making of this statute? If we are to employ those words we ought to know what they mean, so we may know what the rule is that we are going to call upon the courts to enforce.

Mr. LONG. I want to say again to the Senator that the question is a judicial one. It is for the courts to determine, after the law is passed, as to the construction that shall be placed upon it, and whether each particular rate must be fairly remunerative or whether that rate in conjunction with all the other business of the carrier must be remunerative. The nearest approach to an opinion upon that proposition is in the Minnesota case (186 U. S., 269), where the court discussed it, but did not definitely determine it.

But this is not the question I was discussing. I was calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Commission, if this bill becomes a law, has delegated to it by Congress certain administrative functions. It is to determine certain facts following the standard fixed by Congress. It can determine certain questions, and it is not for a court to sit on the wisdom and policy of the decision of the Commission, but it is essentially a legislative and administrative question. Congress could make the rate. It could require that the rate should not go into effect until approved by Congress or until approved by another commission, but we can not require that it shall not go into effect until approved by a court or be set aside by a court on review, unless certain constitutional rights have been invaded.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I would like to ask a question explanatory of this bill which he is advocating, as I understand.

The rule heretofore has been that the measure of the rate fixed by railroad companies should be just and reasonable. This bill provides that the Commission shall fix a rate which in its judgment is just and reasonable and fairly remunerative. What I desire to know of the Senator, who is, I understand, addressing himself to this bill, is what it is intended to do by adding the words "fairly remunerative?" Is it intended to change the old standard of just and reasonable, and if so, is it intended to liberalize that standard by increasing the rates which may be fixed by the carrier or the Commission, or is it intended to restrict the measure of the rate as it has been adjudged by the courts at common law in this country? In other words, what is the effect intended to be had by the addition of the words "fairly remunerative" in the description in this bill of what the rate shall be?

Mr. LONG. I had nothing to do with the insertion of these words in the bill. I do not think they materially change the rule or standard, if at all.

Mr. CULBERSON. Would the Senator object, then, in order to avoid confusion, to striking out those words?

Mr. LONG. I would not object to striking them out.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are two things in the Senator's argument that trouble me, and I will be very glad if the Senator will permit me to ask him two questions.

This bill empowers the Commission to fix just and reasonable rates. If it fixes an unreasonable rate, does it exceed its authority, within the meaning of the amendment which the Senator has offered?

Mr. LONG. If it fixes a rate that is so unreasonable as to amount to a taking of the property of the carrier without just compensation, it does exceed its authority.

Mr. ALDRICH. How is that question to be ascertained?

Mr. LONG. By the courts.

Mr. ALDRICH. My second question perhaps has already been answered. Does the Senator think that Congress can exclude the courts from the consideration of a rate that is within the range or within the field he has talked about—between a rate that is extortionate and one that is confiscatory? Can Congress exclude the courts from considering rates fixed within those limits?

Mr. LONG. What does the Senator mean by "exclude?"

Mr. ALDRICH. To forbid the court; or can Congress undertake to give the Commission power to fix those rates finally, without any review by the courts?

Mr. LONG. Congress can not——

Mr. BEVERIDGE (to Mr. ALDRICH). "Prevent."

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; "prevent" is a better word than "exclude." I accept the suggestion. Can Congress prevent the courts from considering that question?

Mr. LONG. Congress can not prevent the courts from considering the whole question——

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. And determine what their judgment should be as to the order of the Commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. In other words, Congress must give the courts, if it gives them any power at all, power to review the question as to the reasonableness of the rates, within the Senator's meaning of the word "reasonable?"

Mr. LONG. It is not, in my opinion, necessary to give the courts authority to review these questions.

Mr. ALDRICH. That was not my question.

Mr. LONG. The courts will assume——

Mr. ALDRICH. That was not my question. My question is, Can Congress prevent the courts——

Mr. LONG. Congress can not prevent the courts, and should not—and a bill that sought to prevent the courts would be declared unconstitutional—Congress can not prevent the courts from inquiring into the whole question and determine whether the rate has been fixed so high as to be extortionate to the shipper or so low as to be confiscatory to the carrier.

Mr. ALDRICH. But that hardly answers my question, if the Senator will bear with me. The Senator is contending that there is a great field of rates between extortionate rates and confiscatory rates as to which the decisions of the Commission, acting for Congress, must be final unless the whole system is to be overthrown. Now, how can we make those final? Can you prevent the courts from considering every question which is involved in the making of those rates?

Mr. LONG. You can not prevent the court from considering the whole question, but the court will not assume to set aside the rate, if the Commission has acted within its authority, unless the limit fixed by the Commission is unreasonably high or unreasonably low.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is now undertaking to say what the courts will hold.

Mr. LONG. I am giving my opinion. But I will proceed to read the opinions of experts on railroad law on this question, as found in the hearings.

Mr. Walker D. Hines, vice-president of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, in his statement before the committee (Hearings, Vol. II, p. 1150), said—and I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to this language:

> The court can not and will not go into the questions of wisdom and policy which the Commission may determine. The court will be practically confined to a decision whether the order so operates as to deprive the carrier of its property without due process of law. Even if the court could go beyond that, as a practical matter I do not believe it will do it. The court will say, as it has said in so many cases of a similar character, that when the legislature selects a certain administrative tribunal to decide things the decision of that tribunal is final, unless there is some palpable abuse of power or discretion or some palpable mistake on the facts.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator will discover, I think, the difference between these two cases. There is no attempt made here, and no proposition on anybody's part, that the Commission shall determine and prescribe wise rates, but just and reasonable rates, and that is the standard which Congress fixes and which the Commission must follow. So all attempts to change the standard by setting up a standard of wisdom, or any other standard, of course, does not touch the case at all.

Mr. LONG. The question is simply this: The standard is fixed by Congress; authority is given to the Commission; it must act within that authority; it fixes a maximum rate, and, using the language of Mr. Justice Miller, that rate is the law of the land the same as though fixed by Congress, if it is fixed within the authority the Commission had, and the court will only determine whether that rate is so unreasonably low as to be confiscatory, which takes the property of the carrier, or so high as to be extortionate, which takes the property of the shipper.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is using his own language now, and not that of Judge Miller.

Mr. LONG. Yes. Mr. Hines further said—and I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to this:

> If you get an order from a commission making a rate, no matter how you word the power of the judicial review, the court is not going into those facts any further than is necessary to protect the carrier from confiscation, in my judgment. So, no matter how much right you might have theoretically to do that, the matter is going to be left practically with the Commission, unless it palpably abuses its discretion.

VIEWS OF ROBERT MATHER.

Robert Mather, general counsel of the Rock Island system and the Frisco system of railways, in the hearings, on page 1460, said:

I want to make it perfectly plain that the determination of the Commission as to what a rate shall be in a given case is, in the nature of things, under our form of government, absolutely incapable of review, except by another similar Commission, or by Congress itself. Neither the review provided for in the Townsend bill nor the general powers of the United States court, in an application in equity to restrain the enforcement of any rate established by the Commission, could give to the carrier any reconsideration or redetermination of that question. The making of a rate is a legislative function. The only question the court can decide is whether the rate established is a reasonable rate. (Reagan v. Farmers' L. and T. Co., 154 U. S., 362; T. and P. Rwy. Co. v. Commission, 162 U. S., 197; Maximum Rate Case, 167 U. S., 234; State v. Johnson, 61 Kans., 803; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Myatt, 98 Fed., 335.)

None of the "moral and social" or other industrial considerations which might move the Commission in determining what rates should or should not be made could be considered by the court in determining whether the rate established is reasonable. The court's inquiry would be a cold case of figures, its determination being whether the rate established is confiscatory. If the company on all its other business was enabled to earn a fair return on the value of its property, the court would never interfere with the enforcement of the rate established by the Commission.

On page 1472 he also said:

The question whether in the making of a rate or of a system of rates or of a system of differentials, New York and Baltimore or any other Atlantic port shall be permitted to retain that portion of the commerce of the country which it now holds or to increase it or to lose part of it as against the Gulf ports is a political question entirely—that is, it is entirely a legislative question. It is addressed to the legislative discretion of the lawmaking body of this country. The question is, What does the good of the country demand in a case of that kind?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg the Senator's pardon for again interrupting him, and I break in upon his argument only to call his attention to the fact that all the witnesses from whom he has been quoting were talking about just and reasonable rates without having any other standard prescribed by the statute. The term "just rate" or "reasonable rate" is, as everyone knows, an indefinite term, and it allows great latitude. If you are to consider only whether a rate is just and reasonable, any rate is just and reasonable that is fixed between confiscation on the one hand and extortion on the other. But when you add the other element, which was put in advisedly and not until the Hepburn bill was framed, I believe—"fairly remunerative"—you have a new element and one that these witnesses did not consider at all, and an element which the court in review would have a right to consider and pass upon and to determine with respect to it whether or not the Commission had obeyed the act of Congress in that regard.

Nowhere in all that testimony, so far as my recollection goes, can the Senator find any witness testifying as to what the power of the court would be except only in the absence of all additional legislation on the subject and upon the theory that the statute prescribed as the standard the indefinite one of just and reasonable rates. After the words "fairly remunerative" came in, of course, they constituted a new factor which the court would have a right to make inquiry about and pass judgment upon.

Mr. LONG. But, as I have stated before, in my opinion these words do not materially differ from the words found in the Constitution—"just compensation."

Mr. FORAKER. Then, if the Senator comes back to that, I again insist that we shall have a definition of "just compensation" as applied to the making of railroad rates.

Mr. LONG. I say to the Senator again that it is a judicial question whether "just compensation" shall be confined to that particular rate that was challenged, or whether to that rate in conjunction with the other rates made by the carrier.

Mr. FORAKER. We heard a very earnest insistence from the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] a few days ago to the effect that under the Hepburn bill as framed only one rate can be considered by the Commission at a time and only one rate can be affected at a time. Now, assuming that only one rate can be affected, let us, just for the sake of having some intelligence as to this point thrown into the discussion, get a definition, if we can, of what is meant by "just compensation" in the matter of making a rate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I would not ask the Senator to yield, except to say that I certainly did not claim that only one rate could be included in a complaint. I said a complaint could only be made against one line of road. Of course complaints could be made against a number of rates on the same line of road if they were objectionable. I make that statement simply to correct the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I think I quoted the Senator from Iowa correctly; I intended to; but we will assume that he is correct and I am not. He ought to know more about what he said than I do. We will take it that it means the rates on only one line of road. Can we not find out what would be just compensation to the carrier? Suppose you want to fix a rate on one of the roads leading from Chicago to New York, what would be the process of arriving at a justly compensatory rate for hauling a carload of anything, say from pumpkins to silk?

Mr. LONG. As I stated to the Senator before, that is a question for the court to determine. It is a question that the court will determine independent of what we may say about it.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator forgets that if we insert those words we are commanding the Commission to fix rates that are justly compensatory, and before we lay that command on the Commission we ought to know what it is we are going to require the Commission to do.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to inquire if this particular question was considered by the conference at the White House last Saturday afternoon. Sunday morning's paper reports a conference there, at which the Senator from Kansas was present, and reports that an amendment to this bill was agreed on there. I suppose the Senator from Kansas will have no objection to saying whether the amendment that he introduced yesterday was the one agreed on at the White House conference——

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Senator from Kansas if such a conference occurred. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is reported to have been present, and as he is on his feet, I will ask him if such a conference did occur.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not disturb the Senator from Kansas in answering that question. If the Senator from Texas desires an answer from me, however——

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to have it.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very glad to say to the Senator that on invitation of the President I was at the White House on Saturday, and that to my knowledge this important and complicated question of what constitutes just compensation was not considered at that time.

I should like to ask somebody now—of course the Senator from Texas is not a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee—I should like to ask some member of that committee if this whole question of just compensation was elaborately and minutely discussed in that committee, so that the members of the committee would know what is just compensation for carrying a carload of eggs from Chicago to New York.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that I was not permitted to doubt that a conference had been held, and while I wanted it to be confirmed, I was prompted to ask if this particular question was discussed there, because the Senator from Kansas does not seem prepared to commit himself on it.

Now, since the Senator from Iowa has set the example of making a frank answer that a conference was held, I will ask the Senator from Kansas if this amendment which he introduced yesterday morning was agreed on at that conference?

Mr. LONG. I will say to the Senator from Texas that this amendment, which I have offered, was prepared, after a consultation with several gentlemen, but not at the White House.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh!

Mr. BAILEY. Was it considered at this conference?

Mr. LONG. Was it considered at this conference?

Mr. BAILEY. Was it considered at this conference?

Mr. LONG. That conference considered the question covered by this amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. At the White House?

Mr. LONG. At the White House.

Mr. BAILEY. It would tend to clarify the situation if we could know exactly what the President desires. Of course, the Constitution provides a method whereby the President can communicate with either House of Congress, by a message, and to give him the right to recommend what he approves, and then the right to veto what he does not approve seems quite enough power to vest in any one man in this Republic. But if the President chooses to call his party friends around him—and I read here that there were only Republican Senators invited to that conference; I say "invited," because the Senator from Iowa says he went by invitation, and I am sure he would not have gone otherwise—— [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Texas must be exact in his statements. I was not invited to a conference.

Mr. SPOONER. At the White House?

Mr. ALLISON. At the White House.

Mr. BAILEY. You were invited to the White House.

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I stated.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course.

Mr. ALLISON. I was invited to the White House, and I appeared there in response to that invitation, and when I was there this important judicial question of just compensation was not discussed.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator indulge me for a moment? The Senator from Iowa did say distinctly that the question of what was just compensation was not discussed, but he said this other important question of an amendment was discussed.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not say so.

Mr. BAILEY. Then it was the Senator from Kansas who said it.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I only wish to correct the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Was the Senator invited to the White House to take dinner, or to discuss this question?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, it is a matter of so much importance that I must beg to decline to state whether I was invited for dinner or only for luncheon, or whether there was an opportunity of having any refreshment.

Mr. BAILEY. This paper says that Senators ALLISON, CULLOM, DOLLIVER, CLAPP, and LONG, together with Attorney-General Moody, and two Interstate Commerce Commissioners, composed the conference. Now, of course, if the President chooses to confine his conferences to Senators of his own party, and only a fraction of them, I have no right to complain, but if we are trying to make a nonpartisan measure, it looks to me as if it was a matter that ought to have been considered outside of and beyond party lines.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I only want a minute in which to answer the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa. He wanted to know whether or not the term "just compensation" was used in the Interstate Commerce Committee when we were considering this important subject. I will answer the Senator by saying it was, and there were some very pronounced views with respect to it, but views with respect to that question, as to every other that Senators, members of the committee, sought to embody in amendments, were cut off by moving the previous question, so to speak; that is to say, by a motion to report the bill as it came from the House without any amendments; and having the votes, it was reported.

Now, we had views about it there; we have views about it now; there is some difference in the views entertained; and I want to get the view of the Senator from Kansas, who is making a very able speech, one in which, so far as I have been able to listen to it, I have become very much interested. I want to get the benefit of his views. That is all I want to say about that. But before I take my seat I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. He told us what was not considered at the White House conference. Inasmuch as that has become important, I should like to know what was considered there.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator from Ohio address that question to me?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. If the Senator addresses that question to me, I will say in brief that I respectfully decline to answer as to what occurred at a conversation where the President and other gentlemen were present, which I suppose was not a public meeting or a public assembly. In addition, I should like to say——

Mr. BAILEY. How did it get into the newspapers?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator, so that we will have no difficulty in getting on with the conversation. I not only could not answer the question, but I do not think it proper that I should. However, I do not remember what was said there in detail.

Mr. FORAKER. Inasmuch as——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator wants to go into any further questions on that subject, if he deems it proper, I will answer as far as I can.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, no; I would not call upon the Senator to answer about anything as to which he can not recollect distinctly, but I did not introduce this subject, and I have no improper purpose in calling upon the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator rose in his place and stated that he had attended this conference, and told what had not been considered, and I thought, inasmuch as this amendment had apparently been the result of the conference, that it might throw light on this discussion if we could know just what did take place. I should like to be fully informed, but of course if the Senator has any objection I will not insist upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will simply say that I suppose if the Senator from Ohio should be invited to the White House to-morrow, and if I chanced to meet him on his way from the White House to the Capitol and say to him, "What did you say to the President, and what did he say to you?" the Senator from Ohio would consider it a matter of privacy, about which, perhaps, I had no right to inquire.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. But I submit it would be a different case if, instead of meeting the Senator on the sidewalk, I should come into the Senate Chamber and here in the Senate refer to the fact that I had been at a conference about such an important matter, and should state a part of what occurred, or a part of what did not occur.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a matter of ethics——

Mr. FORAKER. Entirely.

Mr. ALLISON. And I will allow the Senator from Ohio to settle it for himself.

Mr. FORAKER. I say it is entirely for the Senator from Iowa to settle for himself. But if I did come into the Senate Chamber and tell a part, I would not object to being interrogated upon the subject.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me for a moment, I think we are confronted by a very grave parliamentary question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LONG. I do.

Mr. BACON. I think we are confronted by a very grave parliamentary question. It is now officially declared that this amendment comes from the White House, and the parliamentary question which has suggested itself to my mind is this: If we should presume to amend it, would that be a conclusion of the matter or would we have to refer it back to the White House to know whether the White House concurred in the amendment which we took the liberty of adding? I should like to hear the Senator from Kansas on that subject.

Mr. LONG. I have been in the Senate only a short time, but I have found that the Senator from Georgia is thoroughly familiar with parliamentary procedure, and he knows more about what is necessary to perfect legislation than I do. I presume this bill must proceed in the regular parliamentary way, be considered by the two Houses, and be submitted finally to the President for his approval.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator does me the honor to suggest that I may be able to determine that question for myself, I will say this: It has never in the past been recognized, so far as I know, that there was any possibility of the propriety of the suggestion of an amendment to a measure pending in Congress coming from the White House. But if the rule is so changed that there is the propriety of a suggestion from the Executive of what amendments should be incorporated upon a pending measure, then the consequence must necessarily and logically follow that if we should assume or presume to amend the amendment, our amendatory action must go to the White House for its approval before it can be the conclusive action of this body. If one is proper, the other is necessary.

Mr. LONG. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the amendment I introduced stands in the Senate in a parliamentary way and in every other way like any other amendment. If he sees fit to amend it and if his amendment is satisfactory to the Senate, it will be accepted. The amendment is nothing more than a suggestion.

Mr. BACON. From the White House?

Mr. LONG. From myself.

Mr. BACON. Ah!

Mr. LONG. It does not, in my opinion, put anything into the bill that is not in the bill now. It is not necessary to adopt it in order to broaden the right of review or limit the review. What I am contending for is that the courts will exercise certain jurisdiction over this question unless we put certain things in the bill that will liberalize their procedure. In my opinion an amendment which requires the courts to broaden their consideration of these questions will result in the whole bill being declared unconstitutional.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. In the newspaper press it was given to the public that at a certain day and hour certain Senators, in conjunction with the Attorney-General and two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, met at the White House and conferred with the President, and that a certain amendment was prepared and agreed upon by the President and the several gentlemen who were named. The amendment was set out in full in the paper which assumed to assert the fact that there was that gathering and that conference and the amendment agreed upon at that conference. The paper went on further to say that the learned and distinguished Senator from Kansas would present that identical amendment to the Senate.

Mr. President, if it had stopped there, if there had been no event subsequent to that to corroborate the statement, we might have passed it by as the possible suspicion or imagination of a newspaper man; but when the event is exactly that which was predicted, and when the Senator from Kansas not only introduced an amendment upon that subject, but introduced an amendment which is in the exact language of that which was published in the newspaper, we are led to believe that that was an authoritative announcement on the part of the representative of the newspaper. Not only was the fact foreseen by him that the Senator from Kansas would present this particular amendment, but we have from that corroboration conclusive proof, unless the Senator from Kansas will deny it, that the remainder of that narrative was true, and that there was an assumption on the part of certain Senators, in conjunction with the President, the Attorney-General, and two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to frame an amendment which, while introduced by the Senator from Kansas does not originate with the Senator from Kansas, if that narrative is correct, but which originates in a conference of those who have no right to propose an amendment to this body, either by suggestion or otherwise.

Mr. LONG. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that he has been long enough in public life to know that we can not believe all that we may see in the public prints. As has been said by the Senator from Iowa, while I am not going to inform the Senator of what took place at the White House, I will say to the Senator from Georgia, as I said to the Senator from Texas, that the amendment I have proposed was not prepared at the White House and was not prepared by the conference at the White House.

Mr. BACON. But before it could be introduced it was thought necessary to get the sanction and approval and permission of those who rule in the White House to introduce it into this body.

Mr. LONG. It was not thought necessary to get the sanction or approval of the gentleman who lives in the White House in order that it might be introduced here.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Accepting the Senator's statement, and of course fully crediting it, that he is responsible for this amendment, and that, like any other amendment, he would be willing to accept any suggestions that met his approbation, and that they could go along in the ordinary course of parliamentary procedure, I should like to inquire if he would be willing to add to his amendment the following words. I shall read a portion of the amendment before I indicate the words to which my question is directed:

> And jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit courts of the United States——

I am reading from the second page, the third line—— > to hear and determine in any such suit whether the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution.

Would the Senator be willing, and thereby conform to the language of the Constitution, to add, after the word "Constitution," the words "or the laws of the United States," making the last clause of the amendment read:

> Or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution or the laws of the United States?

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the second section of the third article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made in pursuance thereof.

Before I sit down I should like to ask a further question, which I think is quite important. Would the Senator be willing to indicate on the thirteenth line, or at such other appropriate place in the amendment where it might be inserted, the right to the shipper to bring suit, if he is not satisfied with the order of the Commission, which order not only may affect the rate, but may affect the practice which if put in force might be ruinous to a shipper or to a community? Would he be willing to insert, as I have inserted in the section of the bill I introduced, that the shipper or any other person who is a party to the proceeding and who is dissatisfied with the order might likewise bring a suit to determine whether their constitutional rights or their rights under the statute of the United States had been violated?

Mr. LONG. I will inform the Senator from Pennsylvania that I am not willing at this time to accept the amendments he suggests, for the reason that we are not at this time considering amendments to the bill for the purpose of adopting them. But if the Senator will present his suggestions in the form of amendments to the amendment, at the proper time, after hearing from the Senator the reasons why the amendments should be incorporated in my amendment, I will give consideration to those suggestions, and if convinced that the amendments are proper and should be placed in the amendment I will at that time be pleased to accept them.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I would not have risen and made this request except in response to the Senator's own voluntary statement a moment ago that he was responsible for the amendment and would be willing to accept any suggestion that met with his approval. Otherwise I should not have made the suggestion at this moment.

Mr. LONG. Now, if I may be permitted to proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I only want to set myself straight, because I feel that the rather curt reply which the senior Senator from Iowa made to the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. ALLISON. I certainly did not mean to be discourteous to the Senator from Ohio in any way.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure not.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not understand what the remark was.

Mr. BAILEY. We all know the Senator's uniform courtesy.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Texas suggested that I had in some way been discourteous to the Senator from Ohio, which I wish in limine, at the very beginning, to disclaim in every way.

Mr. BAILEY. A curt reply is not always or necessarily a discourteous reply.

The Senator from Iowa rather complained that we were trying to wring from him a statement of some private conversation or transactions at the White House. I assure him that while I suggested that line of inquiry I had no thought of that kind. The public prints have given to the country an account of a conference there, and while I am not in the confidence of the people at the White House, I am sure the people who print this matter are, and I am reasonably sure that they got their version of it at the White House.

So I wanted the country to know whether it was true or not that this amendment bore the approval of the executive department. If the Senator had answered yes, then I frankly say I intended to complain that four or five Senators belonging to one party should be called in to agree on an amendment which should be presented without any consultation with the members of the other party.

The Senator from Kansas knows that without the aid of Democratic Senators this bill could never have been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The Senator from Kansas knows that without the practically united support of the Democratic side this bill could never be written into the statute books of this country. And I want publicly to complain against a proceeding which permits five or six men of one party to agree to amendments which are presented without any consultation with the other friends of the legislation. It almost passed my belief, not that these gentlemen would assemble there and confer about an amendment, but that having conferred about it they would present it to the Senate without any consultation with those whose help they must have if we are to have any legislation on this subject.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, not desiring to continue further the controversy that has arisen in relation to the origin of the amendment which I offered yesterday, I will state again to the Senate that I offered it on my own responsibility and it is here in the Senate like any other amendment. I expect it to be considered like any other amendment that may be offered in the Senate.

Now, recurring to the statement of Mr. Mather——

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Some two or three weeks ago, when I was questioning a somewhat similar line of investigation and inquired of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] what had been the errand of himself and his colleague, of which mention had been made in the paper, he told me very courteously it was none of my business. [Laughter.] I think the Senator could get rid of this whole controversy now by just saying, "Gentlemen, it is none of your business."

Mr. LONG. I do not wish to be so discourteous to Senators. Mr. Mather, in closing his remarks before the Committee on Interstate Commerce upon the proposition we were considering, used this language:

So that the proposition I want to make perfectly clear, and to leave here as my opinion as a lawyer, is that no court, whenever such a case as that is presented to it, could ever possibly decide that political question, and there is no way by which Congress might phrase the act so as to confer upon the court the power to say that such and such a rate is a reasonable rate under existing circumstances and then provide that the existing rate was then and should be the lawful rate, or could take away from that act of the court its essential character of being a finding of a political or legislative question.

It is on that ground that I say that not under any circumstances nor by any use of language could Congress confer upon the court any power which, in its final analysis, leaves it to the court to determine what should be the rate or relation of rates in such case.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Kansas approve the statement made by Mr. Mather?

Mr. LONG. I am submitting it as the opinion of a gentleman who is an expert on railroad law. Mr. Mather is general counsel of the Rock Island Railroad system.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was trying to find out whether it met the approval of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LONG. This statement?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. LONG. It does.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Kansas think it is in the power of Congress, the amount being sufficient, to deprive any citizen of the United States of resort to the courts to protect a right arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States?

Mr. LONG. Certainly not. That is what the courts are for.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what I thought.

NOYES ON LAW-MADE RATES.

Mr. LONG. Judge Walter C. Noyes, in his excellent work on American Railroad Rates, states the proposition, page 250, as follows:

It seems impossible to draw a constitutional statute conferring upon a court power to review upon the facts the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in making a rate. The courts could not make a rate, for rate making is not, and can not be, a judicial function. They can not supervise the action of the Commission for precisely the same reason. There is no difference in principle between making a rate and reviewing upon its merits the action of a commission in making a rate. In both cases the exercise of legislative not judicial discretion is required. A statute requiring the courts to participate, directly or indirectly, in making rates for the future would impose nonjudicial functions and would be unconstitutional. To repeat what we have already pointed out—it can not be too clearly borne in mind that while the courts can determine the reasonableness of a carrier's charges they can not in the same way and from the same point of view determine the reasonableness of commission-made rates. When a rate is made by a commission, under a law, it has the effect of a law, which the courts can only review upon constitutional grounds. The distinction is between the reasonableness of a charge and the reasonableness of a law. But it may be said that the courts always have examined rates made by commissions to determine whether they are reasonable, and decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States may be pointed out where the enforcement of commission-made tariffs has been enjoined because the rates were unreasonable. But, as we have already seen, the word "unreasonable" in the sense of these decisions means confiscatory. The only ground upon which the courts could interfere with rates made by the Interstate Commerce Commission would be that they violated the fifth amendment of the Constitution—that they deprived the railroad of its property without just compensation or due process of law. And they could only have that effect when they were confiscatory.

Under the common law, the courts have power to pass upon the reasonableness of the charges of carriers. They must consider all the facts entering into the rate. They may substitute their judgment as to a just and proper charge for that of the carrier, but the courts in examining a rate made by the legislature act in a different capacity. The act of the legislature in fixing a rate is a law that such shall be the rate. The courts can no more question its wisdom or policy than in the case of any other law. It is immaterial whether they think it should have been greater or less. The courts have nothing to do with legislative-made rates, except to determine whether they violate constitutional provisions. In the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 397) Justice Brewer, for the court, said:

The courts are not authorized to revise or change the body of rates imposed by a legislature or a commission; they do not determine whether one rate is preferable to another, or what under all circumstances would be fair and reasonable as between the carriers and the shippers; they do not engage in any mere administrative work.

NOT OPPOSED TO COURT REVIEW.

There is a disposition by those who are not in sympathy with this legislation to insist that there is an effort here to prevent a full review of the orders of the Commission by the courts. Nothing is further from the intention of those who favor this legislation. No one should object to the carrier having an opportunity to have its day in court. It has its day before the Commission, where a full hearing is had and where full opportunity to examine the whole question is permitted before the rate made by the carrier is changed or modified by the Commission. But that is not sufficient. The Supreme Court has gone further and said that the carrier should have its day in court to review the orders of the Commission. The only question is, What can be reviewed? What can a court do after the order of the Commission is made? In the first place, the court can examine and determine whether the Commission has acted within its authority. General rate-making power is not conferred upon the Commission. The power to make rates generally is not delegated to that body. No authority is given under this bill to fix definite rates, and if a definite rate is fixed the Commission has acted beyond its authority. Authority is only given to fix rates upon complaint, and if the Commission attempts to change a rate without complaint it acts beyond its authority. And so inquiry into the question as to whether the Commission has obeyed this law—not only this, but all other laws that have been passed for its government and guidance—is always and should always be permitted in the courts, and no attempt should be made here or elsewhere to prevent such an inquiry by the courts.

One other thing has been determined, and that is that the trial before the Commission is not due process of law; that the finding of the Commission that a certain rate is fair and reasonable is not final upon the carrier; that the carrier can go into court, not claiming that some other rate would be fairer or more reasonable, not to question the wisdom and the policy of the particular rate, but can go into court and charge that the rate is so unreasonable as not to afford just compensation; that it is so low that it does not afford a fair return upon the property employed in performing the service, and the courts have held that if such proof is made the rate fixed by the Commission will be set aside, and this bill as it comes to us from the House recognizes that such proceedings may be had in court to determine this question.

THE EFFORT TO CONFER INDIRECTLY RATE-MAKING ON THE COURTS.

But there are those who are not favorable to this legislation. There has been much opposition to giving authority to the Commission to fix a maximum rate, but realizing the strength and support that this proposition has in the public mind, they have abandoned all hope of defeating this part of the bill.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] presented the affirmative proposition, for all realize that there is a necessity for additional legislation, and his proposition, instead of conferring the power upon a commission to ascertain what is a just and reasonable maximum rate for the future, conferred it upon the court to determine in a particular rate that all above a certain point would be unreasonable and unjust and enjoining the collection of all above that point, leaving that below as the reasonable rate in that particular case and then providing by law that that shall be the maximum rate on this commodity between those points for the future. That is, the court is to take the first step in rate making. But this rate, instead of being made by Congress and a subordinate administrative tribunal—a plan that has been approved in the different States—is made by Congress in conjunction with the courts. This plan has not met with much popular favor. But there will be an effort made in this bill, before we get through with it, to accomplish indirectly what the Senator would rather accomplish directly, and that is, that after the Commission has fixed this maximum rate, after a final hearing upon a complaint, the controversy shall be referred to a court and there, on a review of the proceedings before the Commission, the whole question shall be entered into and the court determine whether or not the order of the Commission is not only within its authority, not only that the rate fixed is so low as not to afford a fair return on the property employed in the service, but also whether or not it is a reasonable rate. In other words, this commission-made rate, made by Congress through the instrumentality of a commission, shall have no more standing or be entitled to no more consideration in a court of justice than a rate made by a carrier.

DANGER IN ATTEMPTING TO CONFER RATE-MAKING ON THE COURTS.

I do not believe that without special legislative authority in this bill the courts will go this far. I do not believe, further, that this authority to participate in rate-making will be exercised by the courts, even though provision is made in this bill imposing that duty on them. I believe that there is great danger in this legislation being declared invalid and unconstitutional if we insert in it a provision authorizing the courts to participate with Congress in the rate-making function.

I believe that the fullest review should be accorded anyone injured by an order of the Commission. When a suit is brought in court to set aside an order of the Commission the question will at once arise whether the order was a lawful order or not, and to determine its lawfulness the court will inquire whether the Commission acted within its authority, for there are certain limitations and restrictions placed upon the Commission by the present law and by the pending bill. It will be necessary for the court, if it finds that the Commission acted within its authority, then also to find whether the order fixing a maximum rate will afford the carrier just compensation for the service performed. The carrier can not be compelled to perform service for the public without receiving a fair return upon the property employed in performing the service. While the court will see to it that the property of the carrier is not taken without just compensation under the order of the Commission, it should not review the order of the Commission as to its wisdom or policy.

Congress under the Constitution has the power to regulate interstate commerce. It can not transfer its power to the courts. Following the decisions of the Supreme Court on the acts of legislatures, this regulation can be made through the assistance or by the interposition of a commission. I believe in Congress exercising its prerogatives, and I do not believe in its attempting to impose that duty upon the courts. It is not practicable for Congress to fix these rates itself by law. It can only do it through the interposition of a commission, but when it does so, and the commission acts, using the language of Justice Miller, "that rate becomes the law of the land," and should not be set aside unless it is so high as to be extortionate and takes the property of the shipper without just compensation or so unreasonably low as to take the property of the carrier without just compensation.

WHY I OPPOSED THE ESCH-TOWNSEND BILL.

The Esch-Townsend bill that passed the House one year ago and came to the Senate sought to impose the rate-making power upon a special court of transportation by providing for a review of the orders of the Commission as to their lawfulness, justness, or reasonableness.

I opposed the Esch-Townsend bill for this reason, among others, when it was considered sacred, and I announced my opposition publicly in my State. I called attention to the fact that that bill was constructed along the lines of the Kansas court of visitation law, which had been declared unconstitutional by both the State and Federal courts. But this bill is constructed along different lines, providing as it does for the procedure before the Commission, and not seeking to restrict or enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts in dealing with orders of the Commission.

That jurisdiction is clearly and definitely defined by the numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. We know how far the courts will interfere with the orders of State commissions. By analogy and comparison, we can readily ascertain how far and under what circumstances the courts will interfere and set aside the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has always been permissible for a shipper to go into court and attack a rate made by a carrier as unreasonble and unjust, but a rate made by legislative authority stands on a different basis. It can only be attacked in court when it is so unreasonable that it does not afford a fair return on the property employed in performing the service. There should be some tribunal to determine whether a charge is reasonable before and not after it is paid. For almost twenty years Congress has been regulating interstate commerce through the agency of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has never imposed the duty upon it of fixing maximum rates to take the place of those it determined were unreasonable and unjust. This bill seeks to impose such a duty upon the Commission. It is an important function. It should only be imposed upon a commission which is constituted upon broad lines and whose duties are clearly and definitely defined.

ONE OF THREE COURSES WILL BE TAKEN BY THE COURTS.

If a provision for review is placed in this bill, similar to the provisions in the different States contained in the document prepared by the Senator from Pennsylvania, one of three things will occur:

First, the United States courts will follow a course similar to that taken by the supreme court of Minnesota, decline to exercise the rate-making function, and confine their consideration of the rate, as they do now, to the question as to whether it is confiscatory, and as to whether the Commission acted within the authority of the law;

or

Second, the courts will assume the jurisdiction, and if they do, then we should not assume to confer this power on the Commission, when, in fact, it is to be exercised by the courts on review, but we should adopt the plan of the Senator from Ohio, and impose the duty on the courts in the first instance;

or

Third, the Supreme Court, following its decisions and taking a course similar to that taken by the supreme court of Kansas in the Court of Visitation case, will determine that this attempt to confer upon the courts the legislative and administrative function of fixing rates is unconstitutional, for the reason that the Constitution gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, and Congress can not transfer that power to the courts, and this provision being incorporated in a bill that might not have been enacted without it, is so closely interwoven with the other provisions of the bill that the whole act is unconstitutional and void.

If the court should take the first course under such a provision for review as is desired by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], no injury would be done and those who favor this legislation would not be disappointed; but if the court should take either the second or third course which I have designated—and I think that one of these two courses would surely be taken—then the purpose and object of this legislation would entirely fail.

THE KIND OF COURT REVIEW I FAVOR.

And so while I believe that this bill would not be held unconstitutional in its present form, for it specifically recognizes the right of review and can not be construed as an attempt to prevent a review, yet I am willing to place in it provisions that are more definite along this line. But I am not in favor of any provision for review similar to those in the different States, to which reference has been made, because I believe that such a provision would imperil the constitutionality of the law and result in its being declared invalid by the courts. If a provision for a court review is inserted in this bill that is so broad as to be construed as imposing the rate-making power upon the courts, it will be done without my vote.

OPPOSED TO ATTEMPT TO ABOLISH TEMPORARY INJUNCTIONS.

I do not favor the attempt to take from the courts any of the power that they now exercise. I want a carrier that believes itself injured or damaged, or its property rights invaded by the order of the Commission, to have the same right to go into court and have that order suspended as is accorded to any other citizen of the United States who feels aggrieved by an act of Congress or the enforcement of any other law. I do not believe that Congress has the power to take from the courts their present authority to grant temporary injunctions. Believing, as I do, that the orders of the Commission can only be set aside when made beyond its authority, or when the constitutional rights of some one have been invaded, I do not believe in placing unnecessary and exacting burdens on any person whose rights have been invaded when he goes into court to have those rights protected. I believe with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] that if the courts are authorized permanently to enjoin the operation of confiscatory rates by final decree, to deny them authority to so do temporarily would limit the exercise of the judicial power.

A person can no more be deprived temporarily of his property without due process of law and without just compensation than he can be so deprived permanently. If a rate fixed by the Commission is so low that it takes the property of the carrier without just compensation by restricting its use, then the carrier should not be compelled to accept that rate a single day, for by accepting it one day or two days its property to that extent has been taken from it without just compensation. It may at the end of six months or a year obtain a final decree setting aside the order of the Commission, but it will be impossible to obtain a return from the shippers of what was unjustly taken from it through the order of the Commission. I am opposed to such an unwise and unjust procedure. I have no objection to a provision requiring notice and a hearing to be had before the order of the Commission is suspended by temporary injunction. No attempt should be made, however, to prevent the court from issuing a temporary injunction, for the carrier should not be compelled to accept a confiscatory rate a single day, even though it is made by a commission.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Is there any provision in this bill which compels the carrier to accept the rate prescribed by the Commission?

Mr. LONG. There is.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not seen it. What is the remedy contained in this bill if the carrier should decline to accept such a rate?

Mr. LONG. There are penalties provided for refusal on the part of the carrier, and a mandamus proceeding is provided to enforce acceptance.

Mr. MORGAN. Does this bill affirm that a carrier engaged in interstate commerce has no right to stop business if it finds it unprofitable?

Mr. LONG. I do not think the bill goes so far as that.

Mr. MORGAN. It does not go so far as that?

Mr. LONG. I think not.

Mr. MORGAN. Then it seems to me the bill has a very slender underpinning.

CONGRESS SHOULD NOT ATTEMPT TO TRANSFER POWER REPOSED IN IT BY THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LONG. The courts of the United States can be relied upon to protect any person, whether an individual or a corporation, in his constitutional rights, for they have always done so in the past; but I do not believe that Congress should endeavor to transfer or delegate to the courts its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce. It is a great and important function, and Congress will prove recreant to the trust reposed in it by the American people, and we will be violating the plain provisions of the Constitution, if we seek to perform this function in any other way or manner than that marked out by the Supreme Court of the United States. Rate-making will after this bill becomes a law be intrusted to the carrier, as it is to-day. The only difference will be that the Commission will have authority to fix a maximum limit, beyond which the carrier can not go in making its future rates. Congress in this bill provides what that limit shall be, and has delegated to the Commission the duty of ascertaining the facts and applying the limitation. It is essentially an administrative function that is delegated to the Commission by Congress, and not legislative. It is a function that can not be imposed upon the courts, and the attempt so to transfer it should not succeed. It would be doing a great injustice to the public to attempt to take from the courts their present power to protect the lives and property of the people when invaded. It also would be a great calamity and unworthy of us as representatives if we attempt to transfer to the courts a duty and responsibility which is imposed by the Constitution upon Congress.

I believe that this legislation is necessary. I believe that it is wise, prudent, and desirable to have a subordinate tribunal to Congress, to which complaints can be made against rates fixed by a carrier and which has the authority, after a full investigation, to set aside the challenged rate and substitute a maximum rate which, in its judgment, is just and reasonable. I believe that this power should be carefully guarded and restricted and that no attempt should be made to restrict or limit the court in its power to prevent injustice, to prevent action beyond the authority conferred by the laws and the Constitution.

We hear much in these days about the injustice of the courts and their assumption of powers not warranted by the laws and the Constitution, but it is gratifying also to know that from the possible aggression of the executive or legislative departments there is a refuge in the courts for an invasion of personal rights, and that there, independent of statute, independent of legislative or executive authority, the rights, liberties, and property of the citizen can be successfully defended and amply protected. I do not at all agree with the criticisms that have been made in this debate upon the judiciary of the United States. I think that the judges of our district, circuit, and supreme courts are generally sincere, honest, faithful public servants, and that they are endeavoring to perform their difficult duties in a way and manner that will meet with the indorsement and commendation of the people; but while I recognize that the courts are always a harbor of refuge for the injured and oppressed, yet I also know that the Constitution imposes certain duties upon Congress, among which is the regulation of commerce among the States, and that Congress can not and should not attempt to exercise this duty by either directly or indirectly transferring it to the courts.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, after the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has spoken in pursuance of the notice he has given, I should like to address the Senate on the pending bill, if I can find an opportunity to do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Notice will be entered.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. STONE. While on the floor, I want to give an additional notice. I will be obliged in the latter part of the week to go to St. Louis on business of pressing moment, and will be gone some days. It has been currently reported through the Senate that at some early day the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines, may in some way bring what is known as the "Philippine tariff bill" before the Senate. That might be done during my absence, and, as I am a member of that committee, I should like to submit some views upon the general subject of that bill. While the bill is not now before the Senate, I thought that on to-morrow I would offer a resolution that would make a basis for saying what I desire to say. I ask the Senate to allow me that privilege on Thursday morning, immediately after the routine business has been concluded.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] having referred to what is known as the "Philippine tariff bill," I desire to say that at the proper time I shall make a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of that bill. That is the only method open to me of taking the sense of the Senate as to whether that proposed legislation shall be considered at all by the Senate at this session. But I have no intention of making that motion while the railroad rate bill is pending, or of doing anything that would interfere with the consideration of that important legislation, which ought to be disposed of at once. My own judgment would be that the Senator could go to St. Louis with perfect assurance that that motion will not be made before he returns, unless he is gone for a considerable length of time. I have no intention of making that motion until, as I have said, the rate bill is disposed of, and of that the Senator, I am sure, will have ample notice.

Mr. STONE. In view of the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that the motion is not likely to be made for several weeks, I will withdraw the notice I gave in which I asked to speak on Thursday morning on that question.

Mr. STONE subsequently said: After talking with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] in charge of the rate bill, I desire to give notice that on Thursday morning I will ask to address the Senate on that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Notice will be entered.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has left the question, which may arise later, about the Philippine tariff bill, I think, just right. I am entirely willing to leave that to his discretion, considering the business of the Senate. He will not make the motion, I take it, to discharge the committee and bring the bill before the Senate until there has been conference about it and ample notice that he is ready to do so.

I only wish to say now that there is an appropriation bill which I desired to bring up this morning, but, as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] wished to go on, I did not ask the Senate to give it consideration. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] desires to-night to get out of the way the conference report on the bill in relation to the Five Civilized Tribes; but I give notice that to-morrow morning, after the routine morning business, I will ask the Senate to take up what, by our rules and consent, always has preference—an appropriation bill.

Mr. SPOONER. What appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. The urgent deficiency appropriation bill. In the meantime the Senator from Minnesota can dispose of the conference report on the Five Civilized Tribes bill.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Maine has concluded—I do not desire to take the floor from him——

Mr. HALE. I have finished.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to be misunderstood. I have no intention of making the motion to discharge the Philippine Committee from the consideration of the tariff bill while the rate bill is pending. When the rate bill is disposed of, I shall then make the motion, but, of course, under the rules, that motion has to go over for a day. I am glad to take this opportunity of giving what may be a somewhat protracted notice, that when the rate bill is out of the way I shall take occasion to make the motion to which I have referred.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to state to the Senate what has been done by the conference committee with reference to the disposition of the coal lands?

Mr. CLAPP. The conference committee felt that the proposition to sell the coal lands was practically rejected. They therefore adopted the House provision, restricting the right of leasing the lands; but in view of the debate the other day I think it is safe to say that the understanding is that the committee would abandon that report. That would be the view of the chairman of the committee, at least.

Mr. SPOONER. Assuming that the lands are to be leased, has the committee agreed upon restrictions which should be embodied in a lease?

Mr. CLAPP. They have not. They have agreed to leave the matter to the Secretary of the Interior. But I think I can say to the Senator from Wisconsin that, after the debate which has been had, it is not at all probable the conferees will report back any provision for a disposition in any way of the coal lands at this time.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is wise. I should like to ask the Senator in regard to section 19, which provided restrictions in regard to the alienation or leasing of lands to the Indians, and so forth. Does the conference report leave the bill so that restrictions upon alienation will be removed?

Mr. CLAPP. The conference committee reported back the Senate amendment about section 19 with an amendment, that no lease for coal or oil lands should be made without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. "Oil, gas, and mineral" is the language employed.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but does it leave it so that all restrictions upon alienation are removed?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. The bill as reported back by the conference committee reads as follows:

SEC. 19. That all restrictions upon alienations and leasing of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes of less than full blood are, except as to homesteads, hereby removed on and after the 1st day of July, 1906: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to authorize the leasing of such lands for oil, gas, or other mineral without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the committee insist upon that provision as it is?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know to which provision the Senator refers.

Mr. SPOONER. We discussed here the other day the propriety of removing restrictions upon alienation and yet retaining restrictions on leases. It is perfectly obvious that that is absolutely trifling with the rights and interests of the Indians. When the Indian leases he does not part with the fee. He may lease for an inadequate rental or royalty, but when the term of the lease shall have expired the fee is still vested in him. But if you give him the full power of alienation, he may be made drunk and robbed of the fee of the land utterly and absolutely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE (in his seat). He may under a lease be robbed of the value of the land.

Mr. SPOONER. He may not be robbed of the value of the land under the lease, because that is made subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, who it is assumed will do his duty.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What the Senator from Wisconsin says now is in response to a remark I made sitting in my seat. I do not think, if the Senator will permit me, that there is very much distinction. It is true that under the lease the Indian retains the fee, but the value of this particular land is in the oil and gas which, under the lease, would be taken off. He would not then retain the fee in that which gives the land value.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, Mr. President, but the Secretary of the Interior may decide as to the terms of the lease.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. It may be for one year or two years or ten years. The rental or the royalty is subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Now, why throw restrictions around the power to lease and yet give the Indian, if he chooses to exercise it, as he will, the power to alienate without restriction?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In answer to the Senator's question I will say that I do not think the restrictions upon alienation should be removed.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah! Then we agree.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is more, I doubt whether the restriction on leasing should be removed.

Mr. SPOONER. We agree.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not know that the Senator had gone that far.

Mr. SPOONER. I have gone that far and further.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How much further?

Mr. SPOONER. So much further as is necessary to protect the Indians against spoliation by the white man.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; whether by lease or alienation.

Mr. SPOONER. I am opposed to doing away with restrictions upon alienation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And leasing also.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course. The bill provides for restrictions upon leasing, but it removes all restrictions upon alienation.

Mr. CLAPP. As to mixed bloods.

Mr. SPOONER. As to mixed bloods. The restriction in this bill on leasing is based on the assumption that a mixed blood is not competent to take care of his own interests. But to provide restrictions on leasing upon the theory that he should still remain under guardianship and yet confer upon him the power absolutely to alienate the land at his will seems to be an absurdity. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will be able to say that the committee take that view of it.

Mr. CLAPP. I can not speak for the remainder of the committee. I think myself a restriction as to alienation should apply to the same character of land as the restriction on leasing, but how the other members of the committee may feel on that question I can not tell. I can not speak for them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to address to the Senator from Wisconsin, and to the Senator from Minnesota also, this question: Why not throw restrictions about alienation, and also not only throw restrictions around leasing, but prevent leasing at present? If the land is leased for five years or ten years or any other number of years, all that gives value to the land will be taken by the lessee.

Mr. SPOONER. These restrictions upon alienation already exist.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. This is a proposition to remove them, but at the same time that the restrictions upon alienation are removed the bill imposes restrictions upon leasing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. My question to the Senator is, Why not prevent leasing? Not why not permit leasing under restriction, but why not prevent leasing of these oil and mineral lands?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not prepared to say that the Indian ought not to be permitted to utilize his land; that he ought not to be permitted, at a fair rental and under leases which are properly safeguarded, to derive what benefit there is to be derived from the use of his land.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That would be true if it were merely the agricultural use of his land, but where it is a use of the land which takes from the land its peculiar value, to wit, its richness in oil or coal or whatever mineral is there, it becomes a different question. It amounts really to an alienation of the land.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not the fee of the land.

Mr. SPOONER. The man would want some value for his land before he died.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. For this year?

Mr. SPOONER. For some year before he died.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Indiana. These people have lands, the patent of which contains a provision that they shall not alienate the fee for twenty-five years.

Mr. SPOONER. This removes that.

Mr. TELLER. It does under certain conditions and with a certain class of Indians——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. And with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; that is, with some regulations of that kind.

I want particularly to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the lease question. There is no provision of law which forbids leasing of these lands. There is nothing in their patent. The limitation is confined entirely to the alienation. The Department has been allowing the Indians to lease their lands for a year or so. These people are citizens of the United States, and I say it is impossible to put any restrictions upon their title that is not already on. There is where I differ with the Senator. This provision for leasing the land and putting the matter under the Secretary probably would not stand the test of the law for a minute. Yet the committee thought it best, if these people did lease their lands, to put them under a moral restraint if it could not put them under a legal restraint, and to provide that somebody should supervise that leasing. On no other theory can you put it in there at all. An Indian holds a title subject to certain conditions. He owns the land as absolutely, except as to those conditions, as any other man does his.

There is the trouble about this leasing business, and it is absolutely true, as the Senator from Indiana suggests, that the value of the land is in the oil. If the Indians should be allowed to lease the land under some regulation that we would have had the power to prescribe if we had not made them citizens of the United States, it would be very profitable to let the Indians lease it, because they would soon get more than the value of the land out of the mineral products which would be produced if the property was properly leased. I do not see now how we are to protect them at all, unless they voluntarily submit themselves to some supervision by the Interior Department, which I believe some people think they will do and others think they will not.

Mr. SPOONER. I think if the Indian has become a citizen of the United States before he acquires title to his lands it is probably impossible—I would not say absolutely—for Congress to impose restrictions upon alienation. But if before he became a citizen, while he was an Indian, the land was patented to him containing a restriction for twenty-five years upon the power of alienation, I doubt very much whether the mere fact that he becomes a citizen does away with the restriction.

Mr. TELLER. I am not asserting that it does.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not commenting on what the Senator said.

Mr. TELLER. I am not so sure, as a question of law, but that it does.

Mr. SPOONER. I doubt if it does, because he accepted the title with that restriction in the deed, and I think he would be estopped probably to challenge its validity.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator will admit we can not add any restrictions now.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know. I will get to that point.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to hear the Senator on that proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not speak dogmatically about it, but it occurs to me that if the allottee or the grantee in the patent is restricted from alienating the land during twenty-five years—the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] says to me that there is nothing in the patent which restricts the power of alienation on the part of these half-breeds.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I do not want to be so understood. As I understand it, these allotments were taken with restrictions, but they were not restricted for twenty-five years.

Mr. SPOONER. However long they were restricted——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The restrictions are such that they are allowed to sell a certain portion of the surplus lands, over and above the homestead, within one year or two years; a certain other portion in three years——

Mr. TELLER. Provided the Secretary of the Interior approved it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; and a certain other portion in five years. Now, the conference committee in bringing in this report removes that much of the restriction upon the sale of the land; that is, it lessens the restriction in the number of years which have been placed upon it.

Mr. TELLER. I think that restriction exists not in this proposed law, but in a prior act.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The present law.

Mr. TELLER. The present law is to that effect. They propose to change the law to that effect.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. If there are no restrictions upon the power to alienate, there is no sense whatever in this provision removing the restrictions upon the power of alienation. If there are restrictions lawfully existing upon the power of alienation, my proposition is that they ought not to be removed. This is an absolute removal of them. I do not find in this provision anything which indicates that they are to be removed or not as the Secretary of the Interior may say.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the present law.

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking of the present law. The statute now in existence provides that they may sell, not their homesteads, but the surplus lands. They may sell a portion this year, a certain portion the next, and so on, provided the Secretary of the Interior agrees to it.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator will pardon me. The present law provides for each one of these tribes a different rule.

Mr. TELLER. I know that.

Mr. CLAPP. Some of the tribes can alienate a certain percentage in one year and so on. Others can alienate all in 1907. The Creeks, I think, can alienate in 1908, but I am not certain as to those dates. But, independent of that, the Secretary can, at present, under existing law, remove the restrictions as to any allottee.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; except the homestead.

Mr. CLAPP. Except the homestead.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin was through.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I only wish to say that I think this discussion is largely advisory.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is entirely so.

Mr. HALE. It shows the large way the Senate has of doing business. The Senator from Minnesota who is in charge of this bill has done what seems to me a very wise thing. Instead of exhibiting any pride in a conference report and a desire to pass it, he has invoked the expression of the Senate as to a very essential and important matter in the bill, and has sought for that opinion, that sentiment of the Senate in order to guide him when he resumes the conference, because when he withdraws his report and goes into conference it will be absolutely a new conference. The mere fact that the conferees have signed a report, unless it is approved by one or both Houses, does not make it a conference report. When the Senator takes this matter back into conference, the whole question is open and all the subjects are open.

Our discussion and the expression here, almost without opposition, have been that the Senate conferees upon every one of these provisions should take the ground that the Indians shall not be further despoiled, whether in lease or in outright conveyance, and that every safeguard which can be placed about this bill to prevent that spoliation shall be employed.

I think the wise course of the Senator from Minnesota who is in charge of this bill has brought about not instructions, for the Senate's position has always been that we do not instruct (when you instruct you have not a free conference), but an expression of the sentiment of the body for the instruction morally of the Senate conferees. I am entirely willing, after what has been done and said, with the feeling of the Senate as it has been shown, to leave the matter to the conferees, headed by the Senator from Minnesota. I hope he will understand that when he goes back and calls for a conference it will be an absolutely new conference; that nothing has been done by the signing of the report; but that it is all open.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from Maine that the conferees were laboring under the impression that they were trying to prevent the Indians from being despoiled. Does the Senator from Maine understand that the conferees are to take as an order, for instance, the discussion to-day in regard to the word "documentary?"

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from Maine that in the opinion of the conferees—all of them, from both Houses—the leaving of these coal lands open will be the avenue to despoiling the Indians; and I should like to know what the Senator from Maine really means by saying that this debate is an instruction to the conferees——

Mr. HALE. No; I do not——

Mr. DUBOIS. That the Senate means the Indians shall be saved from spoliation.

Mr. HALE. I said in the beginning it was advisory. It is advisory in its nature to the conferees to see to it that the Indian is not despoiled. As to the methods, as to how far they should go, whether you shall introduce the word "documentary" or not, as has been suggested, are all for the discretion of the conferees. But I have no doubt the conferees will take the sentiment of the Senate, which is obvious, as in their discretion they shall see fit, that no legislation is submitted to it, when they make their report, which in any way destroys the right the Indians should have.

I must say, Mr. President, that I am not wholly confident that that can be done. I do not suppose that anything we do here will stand in the way of what the years and generations will bring about, and that is the disappearance of the Indian and his rights. It is a pathetic story. Some of us in boyhood read that fine essay of Charles Sprague about the American Indian as he was and as he is, written seventy years ago, treating upon the disappearance of the Indian and all of his rights by—I will not say the encroachment—but by the natural march of civilization.

I have very grave doubts, if we pass a statehood bill and the Indian is submitted to the legislation of the State, whether the legislation of the State will not be dictated by that merciless epigram of the frontiersman—"there are no good Indians except dead ones." But I think in the meantime that in anything we do here we should try, so far as we can, to protect the rights of these Indians. I am entirely willing to leave that with the committee of conference.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the commendation, which the Senator from Maine has expressed better than I could express it, of the spirit and attitude of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], as I have known him for a great many years. He wants to do the right thing always.

My interest in this subject is not derived from books. My interest in the Indians and my knowledge of the Indian character carry me back a great many years to when I served in the Army among the Indians on the frontier—not among half-breeds, but among real Indians.

Mr. HALE. American Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. American Indians. It is not true that the only good Indian is a dead Indian.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will not attribute that sentiment to me.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; I do not attribute it to the Senator. I think General Sheridan said that.

Mr. HALE. It is a frontier epigram.

Mr. SPOONER. I know it is.

I have known some good Indians; some Indians who were as loyal and devoted friends as any white men could be; some Indians who were not only hospitable, but grateful for hospitality; Indians who remembered a kindness. I remember a little band of Indains who fought and some of whom died to rescue from another band of the same tribe some women and children who had been captured at the New Ulm massacre. Congress recognized those men on the petition of Senator Quay only a session before that Senator died.

This is pretty nearly the last act in the drama. The Indian is utterly improvident, Mr. President. He has always been. I do not speak of exceptional Indians, but of Indians generally. He is an easy prey to the white man. I have believed that the policy which was adopted a great many years ago of imposing restrictions upon the Indian's power of alienation of land was a wise one, and not only was obviously a wise one but the only honorable and decent thing a trustee could do. So I have looked with suspicion and with something of resentment upon the provisions which I have found for years here in the Indian bill, so called, removing these restrictions upon the power of alienation. There are Indians who are incapable of protecting their own interests. There are Indians who can not protect their own interests, but whose squaws or wives have more forethought and care, and whose influence is adequate to protect the interest of the male.

But as a body, Mr. President, the Indian is not capable of looking after his own business interests. We made them American citizens, I think improvidently, I think wickedly. I think it was a crime against them, whatever those gentlemen who have for years been promoting this scheme have thought about it, to have made American citizens of the Indians. It did not change their natures; it could not. It did not render them any less susceptible of sinister influence—influences, I might say—by the white man who sought to despoil them.

Mr. HALE. It rendered them more susceptible.

Mr. SPOONER. As the Senator from Maine says, it rendered them more susceptible, for it clothed them with a dignity which they were not fit to appreciate, and with functions to the exercise of which they had not been trained.

Now, here comes this bill. There are restrictions, or there would be no sense whatever in the provision which provides for their removal. Whether the restrictions are to last a long time or a short time, they ought not to be removed at all unless it be in exceptional cases, after thorough investigation by the Interior Department, which may develop the fact that this Indian or that or the other is capable of protecting his own interests. But to provide that the restrictions upon the power of alienation shall be entirely removed and yet that he may surrender the dominion in a lesser degree of alienation for a year or two years or three years by lease be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior is simply nonsense. It is trifling with the Indian, Mr. President, because there will be found means enough among the white men who follow the trail of the half-breed until their toes turn in in order to beguile from them their estate. They will convey; they will alienate.

I agree entirely that they should be permitted, for they may need it, to lease, but not for a long time. I do not like this provision for a year or more, for that is indefinite, although it is subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. I think there ought to be a limit upon the power to lease so far as time is concerned. But certainly it is true that to remove restrictions upon the power of alienation and yet to leave the power to lease for a year or more subject to restriction is an absurdity.

Congress is pressed all the time to remove these restrictions. I believe, although I know the perfect good faith of the committee, this pressure to remove restrictions is not in the interest of the Indians. Now, here is a provision in the bill——

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The Senator suggested a short time ago that there might be some Indians who were capable of having their restrictions removed.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. There have been a great many special bills introduced here for the removal of restrictions, and they have passed from Congress to Congress. I do not believe there is a single one of the Indians who sold under the power which removed the restrictions who has anything of the proceeds of the sale to-day. As a matter of fact, I think the Senator can be general in his statement, and say that the policy of removing restrictions at all, in isolated cases or any other cases, is detrimental to the Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt that is true. I called the attention of the Senator at a former session to a case where an Indian was permitted to sell without restriction the timber on his land in my State. He received $2,300 for one installment. He took his squaw and papooses to St. Paul, and when he came back to Ashland with them he came back with a pair of horses, a magnificent set of harness, and a silver-plated hearse. They were unloaded, the horses were hitched to the hearse, the squaw and the family took their places in the hearse, and the father of the family mounted the front seat and drove through the city of Ashland as proud as Lucifer. They were beguiled at St. Paul under the influence of drink into the squandering of the money which they had. That is in line with what the Senator says.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How are the Indians permitted to sell the timber?

Mr. SPOONER. It was done under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. I expect that the purchasers made a very handsome profit. They did not do the business at a loss, the Senator may be certain.

Mr. HALE. I suppose also, though I have never been on this committee, but we have it up now and then in other committees——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we can not hear on this side what is being said. This is a subject that some of us are interested in, and I should like to hear what the Senator says.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that in almost all cases the pressure that is brought upon us here for just such legislation as the Senator has referred to does not come from the Indians; it comes from the rapacious whites, who ask us to legislate upon the general theory that, having made the Indian a citizen, which was a mistake, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, we must give him the right of a citizen and give him an opportunity to alienate and to lease.

I agree with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] that we ought to limit the right of leasing, because if we permit it unrestricted it may separate the Indian from all the valuable part of his property. The Senator from Colorado knows more about this general subject than any of us, and I presume he will bear me out in the statement that the movement, the pressure for legislation to give the Indian more and more power to alienate and rob himself of his title and his property, does not come from the Indian. It comes from the other source, from the people who want to take advantage of the improvident nature of the Indian. Whether, confronted by that natural disposition of the Indian, we can for any length of time protect him and secure him, I have very grave doubts, but I think we ought to keep on trying to do it just as long as we can.

Mr. MCCUMBER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I think the Senator from Maine leaves out one important point, and that is the influence of the people of the State or the county wherein the Indian is located. They want these lands, first, for white settlers; secondly, they want the lands made taxable, so that they will pay a part of the burden of carrying on the government. The influence from that section, especially from Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, to drive the Indian out for the very purpose of getting hold of the land and making it taxable is simply terrific.

Mr. HALE. I had all that in mind. The movement comes not from the Indians, but from just such sources as the Senator indicates.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from North Dakota will allow me to call attention to the fact, in connection with his observation, that the last proviso of section 19 is as follows:

Provided further, That all lands upon which restrictions are removed shall be subject to taxation.

That is a part of the provision.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. As I am compelled to leave the Senate, I ask to have printed as a document a letter from Mr. Albert J. Lee on the subject of this bill; and I should like to have it referred to the conference committee when the bill shall go back.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a prohibition in this clause that—

No full-blood Indian of any of said tribes shall have power to alienate, sell, dispose of, or encumber in any manner any of the lands allotted to him for a period of twenty-five years from and after the passage and approval of this act, unless such restriction shall, prior to the expiration of said period, be removed by act of Congress.

Does that apply to citizens?

Mr. TELLER. I think that refers to the condition which exists. I think it is badly worded. It was intended to say these people having a twenty-five years' restriction——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. CLAPP. They are barred from restriction.

Mr. SPOONER (reading)—

That no full-blood Indian of any of said tribes shall have power to alienate, sell, dispose of, or encumber in any manner any of the lands allotted to him for a period of twenty-five years from and after the passage and approval of this act, unless such restriction shall, prior to the expiration of said period, be removed by act of Congress.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that that is an extension of the restriction. I did not know exactly what it was.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is an amendment which I prepared and introduced and had attached to the bill. The chairman has already stated in the session to-day that the limitation upon the restriction on full bloods and others expired, some of it in 1906, some by 1908, some by 1913, and it was for the very purpose of preventing the period of expiration from attaching that I introduced it as an amendment and put it all for a period of at least twenty-five years, so that it will cover all of those cases and cover both homesteads and the allotted lands which are not homesteads.

Mr. SPOONER. Have these Indians become citizens of the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. There is a provision which says that they shall be citizens of the United States when they are allotted, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there have been a number of decisions (and I had them here the other day) stating that the mere granting of citizenship to them did not affect their property, which was held under agreements with the Government, and as long as they continue their tribal relations, although they are citizens, the Government still has control over their property. My position has been, and is yet, that although the Government has declared that it will remove a restriction within a certain time, if that time has not lapsed and the ward has not disposed of the property, as long as the wardship continues the Government may still extend the provision for another period of years.

Mr. SPOONER. I am entirely in accord with the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the view I took here, although I am free to say that many Senators did not agree with my legal proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President, I do not care to take the time of the Senate any further. I defer very much to the better knowledge of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and of the chairman of the committee upon this subject. In conclusion, I wish to say that I do not think we ought to loosen this business and remove the restrictions which now exist. I have a little bit of a personal reason to remember the fidelity of some Indians. I have great sympathy with them. If we do not look to their interests no one will. So I venture to hope that when the bill goes back to conference it will be so changed, at least, that the provision removing all restrictions upon alienation will be omitted from it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I understand the chairman of the committee wishes to make a statement, and I defer to him for the present.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from South Carolina has called attention to section 9, where the Senate amendment was concurred in. I think the Senator is quite correct, and so far as the chairman is concerned, it will be the sense of the conferees to strike that out in conference.

Mr. TELLER. What provision is that?

Mr. CLAPP. The Brown provision.

Mr. SPOONER. That ought to be done.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I fully concur in all that has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] in regard to the question of alienating Indian lands. But one thing is very certain. As the Indian advances one means of his advancement is to enlarge his opportunity. Everyone concedes that there comes a time to some of the Indians when they ought to have the right of alienation.

Now, we are confronted by this condition, and it is no easy matter to solve the question. If we leave it subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior to remove a restriction, while it may develop a roll of honor according to the thought of that Department, while it may encourage Indians to pursue a course that will warrant the Secretary in removing their restrictions, at the same time the man who is going to purchase the land knows and the Indian knows that before he can sell he must get those restrictions removed. The consequence is, it lessens the prospective value of the Indian's allotment. Then, the Indian is made to believe another thing, that before he can get those restrictions removed he has got to employ somebody; and another slice is taken out of the Indian's property.

So, it is no easy question to determine whether we should remove by classes, leaving perhaps in a class some who have not advanced far enough, or whether we should remove singly in individual cases. I say frankly, from a study of this question, with all its inequalities, with all its evils, I am rather inclined to think that the better plan as the Indian advances in development is to take those of mixed blood and remove the restrictions by statute, saving them from the necessity of paying attorneys' fees as individuals to get them removed.

Mr. TELLER. Five hundred dollars a claim.

Mr. CLAPP. It is $500 a claim in some instances. Then adopting the policy of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], we should allow no restriction on these full bloods to be removed until such time as Congress can by act remove them and relieve them from the process of being preyed upon by those who make them think that they can not reach the Department themselves.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, section 9 of the bill the chairman says he thinks ought to go out. The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] says he thinks it ought to go out. There is not anyone in the Senate who knows anything about section 9 except the members of the committee; and I am going to state the facts briefly.

When the war broke out a part of the Seminole Indians were loyal to the Government and a part were disloyal. There was a regiment of them raised and they were the loyal Seminoles. Their houses, barns, and fields were raided by the Confederates. Their horses were stolen and there were various things done. They set up a claim against the Government. That claim existed until about five or six years ago. Various committees reported it favorably at times, but never any redress was given to those loyal Indians. About two years ago, and after they had become citizens of the United States, they appointed a committee that made a contract with some lawyers to prosecute this case here. One of the gentlemen who prosecuted it had been one of the officers of that regiment. They came here and a bill was passed. I do not know just how the provision was settled, but, anyway, there was an appropriation made to pay them something less than $200,000.

Now, remember, Mr. President, these were not Indians when the claim was allowed; they were citizens of the United States, and ex-soldiers and the heirs of ex-soldiers. Every one of them was a citizen of the United States. There was no necessity for them to go to the Department for the approval of the contract. When this money was paid out the Department sent the money to a man by the name of Brown, and authorized him, after he gave a bond, I think for $300,000 or $400,000, to pay it out. Mr. Brown proceeded to pay, amongst others, the attorneys of these Indians. He paid the bills of these Indians at certain stores where they had been running on credit.

Later it was claimed that there was irregularity in the payment; that the payment ought to have been made through Mr. Brown, who was the treasurer of the Indians when they had their tribal relations, and he had paid out the money as the agent of the Interior Department and under their authority. There was a man at that time, and the country is full of them, who thought he saw a chance to get a fee out of it, and he induced some of the Indians, how many I do not know, to bring suits. The Department took it up, as it was an Indian matter, and 211 suits were brought against Mr. Brown by men who had received the money and who had it in their pockets or had spent it. He had paid it to them, or he had paid it to men they owed, in accordance with the custom down there. The Department has no more to do with that than it has with a claim against me; and yet to-day the Government of the United States is paying the expenses of this prosecution, which if it can be maintained at all could be maintained only upon a technical ground, and in my judgment can not be maintained at all.

This is to ratify that act. It may be that there is something crooked about it, but there has been no claim that I know of, at least there has been no evidence that would substantiate any position that these people had been robbed.

Now, that is one of the things that we have to deal with. We had no business to have anything to do with it at all—none whatever.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. It was, in my judgment, somewhat of a close question. The invalidity of the payment rests upon the fact that the account of the guardian was allowed by the judge in chambers——

Mr. TELLER. That was only a part of it.

Mr. CLAPP. Under a law which required that it should be done in open court. But there is a good deal of evidence in that matter which, to speak guardedly, perhaps throws some suspicion around the transaction. There seems to have been a sort of circuitous route by which a good deal of the money went to many who were very closely connected with the administration of the affairs down there, at least so much so that I felt no hesitation, if there was any demand for it, in leaving it out, though I am not as clear on the subject, perhaps, as I might be.

Mr. ALLISON. I see there is an elaborate amendment here agreed to in conference.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say a little further that there is a provision here which leaves these suits pending if they want it. It is time that the Government of the United States should learn that it should not maintain suits in the name of individuals and pay the expenses out of the Treasury of the United States. That is what we are doing in this litigation.

Mr. President, I want to say something else about this bill. The Senator from Minnesota is very anxious to close it and I wish to say it now, as I want to drop that question. It is not a very important question one way or the other. Mr. Brown, who served the Government in that capacity, may be ruined by this proceeding, and that will go with a thousand other cases of the same kind.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] raised the question as to whether these people are citizens. There is not any doubt about that. By positive law, by statute, some of them have been made citizens of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to say that that is not my position. My position is that they are citizens, but that citizenship of itself does not dissolve the tribal relation, nor does it by itself necessarily dissolve the relation of guardian and ward. So long as the Indians continue to be our wards, we have control over their property.

Mr. TELLER. Then I misunderstood the Senator. If they have become citizens, I do not think it needs any argument to show that the United States are not the guardians of anyone. There is not any power in the General Government to become the guardian of anybody. The Indians, however, are not the wards of the Government of the United States. The Supreme Court has settled that question. The moment they become citizens of the United States, to all intents and purposes they are full-fledged citizens. Citizenship is not a thing that can be put on and taken off. It is a great privilege for a man to be a citizen of the United States, and it carries with it great obligations also. All those we have conferred upon those people. Whether it was wise to do so or not is not now a question. It is an act which can not be retraced. There is no way under the sun that these men, having become citizens, can now be deprived of their citizenship, except after trial and conviction as a punishment for the commission of a crime. They are citizens of the United States.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] thinks because the Indians took land with an obligation that they should not sell it in five years, we will say, or in six years, that Congress now, after they have become citizens of the United States—if I understood him correctly, and if I did not he will correct me—can put a further limitation on their right to dispose of their lands. Their right to these lands becomes absolute, say, in five years from now. Can we extend that to ten years?

Mr. President, if the Senator will stop for a moment to think, I do not believe that he or any other lawyer here will make that statement. It can not be defended upon principle, and certainly no precedent can be found for it. This provision seems to be an attempt to extend the time, which I did not understand, for I thought it had reference to another condition; but the Senator from Minnesota says it means that it is an attempt to extend the time. This amendment was put on in the last hours of the consideration of this bill here, was it not?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; just before we adjourned.

Mr. TELLER. It was put on just before we adjourned and disposed of the matter. If I have done the Senator from Minnesota any injustice in that remark, I should like to have him state it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if the Senator understood me to say that the Government possessed any right to restrict a citizen as to the power of alienation of his property acquired after he became a citizen, he misunderstood me. I understood the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to say that it had been decided that after an Indian had been made a citizen, so long as he maintains his tribal relations he is still a ward of the Government, and that so long as he remains a ward of the Government——

Mr. TELLER. If there is any decision of that kind, it is a very foolish one; but I do not believe there has been any such decision. I did not understand the Senator from North Dakota to state that.

Mr. SPOONER. That so long as the Indian was the ward of the Government Congress might extend the time or duration of these restrictions. I said if that were true I was entirely in accord with him that it ought to be done. That is all.

Mr. TELLER. What ought to be done and what we can do are two distinct things.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say we could do it.

Mr. TELLER. But we must consider it from the standpoint of what we can properly do.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that when we conferred nominal citizenship on the Indian that he passed from the domain of guardianship legislation on the part of Congress? If that be so, we need spend no more time in safeguarding the rights of the citizen Indian, but must leave him in the same position we leave the citizen of Colorado, of Wisconsin, or of the Dakotas, and of Maine. I did not quite understand that that was the operation of the conferring of citizenship when the Indian remained in the tribal relation.

Mr. TELLER. The Supreme Court settled that case this last summer.

Mr. HALE. How?

Mr. TELLER. By declaring that the Indian had absolutely all the rights of any other citizen.

Mr. CLAPP. That is, political rights.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; political rights.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I wish to say that the Supreme Court has decided absolutely to the contrary in a number of cases. I had a case here the other day, which held that the mere granting of political rights did not in any way effect civil rights over property of the Indian so long as he maintained his tribal relations. There are two or three cases that have been decided quite lately.

Mr. HALE. I have so understood.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I simply wish to make a statement to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in the consideration of this matter. As I understand the whole question of allotment and alienation, it is this: When these Indians consented to the plan of the Government to allot this land in severalty, it was done upon certain stipulations made and entered into between the Government and the Indians—a solemn contract, under which they took their allotments. Now, to vary the terms of that contract against the Indians, seems to me as violative of the good faith with which it was entered into, to say nothing as to the law, and without reference to the law or the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. If the Indian took his allotment with the distinct understanding and agreement with the Government that a certain portion of that allotment he could alienate in one year, a certain other portion in two years, and a certain other portion in three years, the attempt to extend the limitation for more years than that, it seems to me, is a breach of contract on the part of the United States. I submit that to the Senator from Maine for his consideration in this matter.

Mr. HALE. I have always had very grave doubts about that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We have always taken the authority to deal as we pleased with the Indians in the Indian Territory and everywhere else. We have taken upon ourselves to violate year after year, by our legislation, every solemn covenant that we have entered into with the Indians. It is a breach of morality, but we seem to have the power to make that breach.

Mr. SPOONER. We have done that with all Indians.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We have done that with all Indians; and I think it is time we should stop it. So I am in favor of living up to the agreements we have made with the Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. It has been for the protection of the Indians against spoliation. There is no selfishness in it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no selfishness in it probably, but you are violating the agreement you made with them.

Mr. HALE. Quite likely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose we found the agreement to be injurious to our wards, would we not be justified in violating it?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think not, under the conditions as they exist in the Indian Territory. I do not think we have any right to enter into an agreement and violate it, because when we entered into it it was one of the essential things that gained the assent of the Indians to taking this land in severalty, that at some time they would be able to deal with it, and would be allowed to deal with it themselves. They never would have consented to taking the land unless that had been done.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that we were too sentimental and went too far.

Mr. SPOONER. We were not sentimental enough.

Mr. HALE. I have always had very grave doubts about the making of those allotments. It was done somewhat upon the theory that we made some very disastrous experiments in the South, conferring rights upon people who were not competent to exercise them, and we have had nothing but trouble ever since. We went too far and trusted too much to our sentiment in regard to the Indians. We afterwards found that it did not work; that we could not, simply as if it had been a compact between two nations which we were obliged to maintain; we found as to the Indians that we had got to interpose and save them from the result of our own legislation. We have been doing that ever since, and we are trying to do it now, as I have said.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator just one question, and that is, which he considers the most sacred obligation, an obligation simply to keep our word to our ward, to keep our contract with our ward, or our obligation to do our duty by that ward which will be for his best interest? If we are to do one of the two things, had we not far better break our original contract and make a new one that shall protect him?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but why hold the Indian to his contract? If we are going to break the contract on our part, why not allow the Indian to break it on his part, and take back these lands as they were when he made the contract with us?

Mr. McCUMBER. Those are conditions that it would be impossible to fulfill because the lands have been disposed of.

Mr. TELLER. We should have less trouble if Senators would get out of their minds the idea that these people are the wards of this Government. Why are they the wards of this Government?

Mr. McCUMBER. If they are not, then all of our legislation concerning them is void.

Mr. TELLER. No; it is not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know how we can legislate for them as our wards if they are an independent people.

Mr. TELLER. We have put certain restrictions on them. If we have not the power to do that, then the contention of the Senator is all right. But, Mr. President, this bill has a number of things in it that we might do if those people are citizens, because we are carrying out the treaties with them.

Mr. President, there is not an Indian in the Indian Territory—not one. The 90,000 people who were Indians are not Indians to-day. You can go down into Alabama or Mississippi and find 90,000 people less qualified to discharge the duties of citizenship than are these men. Shall we go down there and take them in as our wards? Every citizen in this country, whether he be black, red, or white, whether he be rich or poor, whether he be learned or ignorant, is the same before the law. The Government has as much control over the wisest and richest man in the country as it has over the poorest and the most ignorant man, who can say, "I am an American citizen," as Paul of old said, "I am a Roman," when his enemies shrank back and did not inflict the blows upon him they had intended to. He can say, "I am an American citizen; I take the full protection of the law. The Government of the United States, great as it is, can not make me anything less than a citizen." Red, white, or black, ignorant or wise, the right belongs to him, and you must recognize it, and it is an invasion of his right when you talk about protecting him and taking care of him.

Mr. HALE. Then, let me ask the Senator, why should we spend our time here in attempting to legislate upon it at all if the Indian has all the attributes that a citizen has?

Mr. TELLER. A citizen of the United States may hold a title that is not a perfect title. If I give him that title, I can release——

Mr. HALE. No; that is left to the courts.

Mr. TELLER. Can I not?

Mr. HALE. That is left to the courts.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no. If I grant to any man a title that is not full and absolute, to-morrow I can give him a new and complete title, if I see fit. He does not have to go into court.

Mr. HALE. That is new doctrine to me. I have not considered, and never did consider, that the granting of political citizenship to the Indian absolutely separated him from the care and guardianship of the United States, because, if that proposition is true, all the time that we have spent on this subject since then has been utterly and entirely lost, and we might just as well have dismissed it.

Mr. TELLER. Well, Mr. President, suppose that is true. We may as well dismiss it. Let us face the question here.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. TELLER. Not just now. Let us face this question. Are these men citizens? If they are, is there any distinction between them and other citizens? What is that distinction? Poverty? There are millions of men poorer than they. Is it ignorance? There are millions of men more ignorant than they. Is it inability to take care of themselves? They can take care of themselves better than one man out of a hundred in the slums of the great cities.

Mr. President, there is not anything in law, there is not anything in morals that will justify us in depriving the Indian of any right or assuming the control over him that we do not assume over every other man. I do not know anything in the Constitution of the United States that will justify you or me or the National Government in finding a difference in citizenship. When you depart from the principle that every citizen is the equal of every other citizen under the law, and that the hand of the Government must be as light upon one as upon the other—the moment you depart from that principle there is an end of free government; there is an end of the boasted liberty that is talked about in this country. Every man must stand before the law the equal of every other man, and he must perform every duty that is incumbent upon him, so far as his condition will permit. The Indian took the duties of citizenship upon himself, but when he took them he took other things besides, so that he might stand before the world and assert, "I am free from the control of everything except only the law that is put over me, and which I must observe as other men, and only as other men." He is a man.

This may go to the courts. There can be no two sides to this question. I do not deny that, having given a patent with certain restrictions, we may adhere to those restrictions. I do not insist that because he had taken a deed from me when he was a citizen, nobody but the man who took the deed and myself could change that deed.

I want to say a word or two more about this matter. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] speaks about the frontier idea that there are no good Indians but dead Indians. I have had forty-five years' experience with the Indians on the frontier, and I want to say that, except during a state of war, there has never been an outrage perpetrated by any frontiersman on the Indians. They have been the best friends the Indians have had. They have done more for their elevation and civilization than have the people in any other portion of the United States.

We have had wars with the Indians. Sometimes they have come into our neighborhoods and massacred our people, and it is but human nature that when the frontiersmen went out after them some cruelties would be perpetrated upon them; but in time of peace we have welcomed the Indians to our towns; we have assisted them with our efforts to make them better in every way. It can not be charged against the western people, nor the pioneers, that they have not been friendly to the Indians. They have been not merely friendly, but they have been deeply interested in elevating the Indians. The severe and difficult and destructive laws that have been passed were not passed at the instigation of the people of the West. They were passed in defiance of our protest. The records of the Senate will show that for twenty-five years, and more, I have protested against giving to the Indian land in severalty, because he was not fit to take care of it and would not occupy it. Again and again I have entered my protest in the Senate. I have predicted what would happen—what now every man knows he is facing—a landless Indian.

We added to that great mistake by making them citizens of the United States. The people of the West did not ask it; the Indians did not ask it; but it was believed by some that citizenship would civilize and elevate them.

The Indian is an expiring race. Time will settle this problem. Whether we have acted wisely or foolishly, the time will come when the red man will disappear; but we have hastened it by many years. We have brought about that which in the course of time might have occurred with less friction and with less trouble, but it is coming.

As I said the other day, the only thing left for us is to do what we can for these people in the Indian Territory, and if we can, to still keep our hands upon those who have not become citizens.

I will not repeat what I said the other day, that I felt very anxious, and as I do now, that something shall be done that these 90,000 citizens of the United States may, if possible, be fitted for citizenship; may, if possible, be made to understand the great privilege that they now are enjoying, and may, if possible, be taught to discharge some of the duties of citizenship, so that it will be a benefit to us and a benefit to them.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I rise now to a question of the order of business. It is getting late, and there ought to be an executive session. I should like very much if we could dispose of the conference report so that it would not be in the way of the appropriation bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. CLAPP. Unless objection is made, I will now formally withdraw the conference report from the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to say a word about the Brown case in reply to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have an executive session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 4, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

H. R. 8891. An act granting an increase of pension to Josephine Rogers; and

H. R. 3924. An act granting an increase of pension to Carrie A. Conley.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 4825. An act to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainy River in the State of Minnesota;

S. 5181. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River between Whitman and Columbia counties, in the State of Washington;

S. 5182. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Franklin and Benton counties, in the State of Washington; and

S. 5183. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River between Douglas and Kittitas counties, in the State of Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 21.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,000 copies of the Topical Index to the Twelve Annual Reports of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes to the Secretary of the Interior, 200 copies for the use of the Senate, 400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 400 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 11.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print from stereotyped plates 100 copies each of volumes 11 and 12, Decisions of the Department of the Interior Relating to Public Lands, and part 1 of digest of volumes 1 to 30, Land Decisions, and also 100 copies of volume 15, Decisions of the Department of the Interior Relative to Pensions and Bounty Land, and to deliver the same to the Secretary of the Interior for distribution and sale.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13103) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to the employers' liability bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to make a statement—of how long?

Mr. PEARRE. About a minute.

The SPEAKER. Of a minute in regard to the employers' liability bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that when the bill was up yesterday for consideration, I was unavoidably detained out of the city, and was therefore unable to be here. I wanted to say that if I had been here I would have voted for that bill in the House to sustain the report of the committee. I would like to be recorded as having made a statement in favor of the passage of the employers' liability bill.

FEDERAL QUARANTINE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution from the Committee on Rules:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 371, have had the same under consideration and respectfully report the following in lieu thereof:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider the bill (H. R. 14310) entitled "A bill to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and to impose further duties thereon," with the amendment in the nature of a substitute as proposed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and printed on pages 4669 and 4670 of the RECORD of March 31, 1906; and the said amendment in the nature of a substitute shall be read by sections for consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

General debate shall continue until 4 o'clock p. m., and thereafter debate under the five-minute rule until 5 o'clock p. m., at which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all pending amendments to the final passage. Amendments shall be in order at any time during the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, to any paragraph thereof, whether the same shall have been reached or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On that I ask the previous question.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to ask the gentleman a question: What his wishes are with respect to debate before the adoption of the rule, or whether he wants any debate on the rule at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am going to submit a statement immediately after the passage of the resolution. It has been agreed, I think, that the twenty minutes' time usually consumed in the discussion of the rule shall be added to the debate on the bill itself. I want to get unanimous consent for that, and I will ask it after the rule is adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] is entitled to twenty minutes in opposition, as he is against the rule.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the forty minutes usually consumed in the discussion of the rule be dispensed with, so that the time may be added to the time of the House for the discussion of the measure itself.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object to that, although I had hoped that possibly I might have perhaps two minutes in which to call the attention of the House to the outrage that the gentleman from Mississippi is proposing to perpetrate upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. DALZELL. I want the gentlemen on the other side of the House to know that here is a great constitutional question, involving the rights of the States and of the Federal Government, a question that might be debated in this House for a week or two weeks or three weeks, and yet the gentleman from Mississippi proposes to gag us into four hours' debate. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that he shall have the two minutes, and more time if he shall desire it; and at the same time, or immediately subsequent thereto, I shall take the opportunity of expressing my opinion of the system of rules which forces a man, even when he desires to do so laudable a thing as to protect the women and children of one-third of the country from the ravages of yellow fever, the invasion of an army worse than an armed host, to resort to this method to get it before the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is due to the rules of the House that he is able at this time to take up this measure, and thereby protect the women and children and all the rest of the people who are interested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it is owing to the rules of the House that I could not get it in regular order in any other way.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] is entitled to twenty minutes in opposition.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not object.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to ask unanimous consent, and it was upon that question that I arose, and not for the purpose of objecting.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Mississippi did ask unanimous consent, and the Chair will put it to the House. Is unanimous consent given to dispense with further debate on agreeing to the resolution?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair fancies that after all it would have to be taken that unanimous consent is to be given. It seems to the Chair that it ought to be within——

Mr. BARTLETT. I have never seen the rule undertaken to be enforced in that way, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. On this kind of a proceeding, if it has not been enforced, there ought to be the power to enforce it; but by the unanimous consent of the House, outside of the twenty minutes, the Chair will——

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not desire to proceed by the unanimous consent of the House when I have the right to proceed by the courtesy of the gentleman from Missouri, who has yielded to me five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly——

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not desire at this time to have the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes, yielded to him by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. After unanimous consent has been asked to dispense with debate on the adoption of the rule, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], in control of the time in opposition of the rule, grants five minutes for debate.

The SPEAKER. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I thought.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Georgia merely wants to reserve the right to object while he asks a question, I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia for that purpose.

Mr. HEPBURN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to ask if the request of the gentleman from Mississippi as he stated it, namely, that the forty minutes' debate be dispensed with and that that time be applied to the general debate upon the bill, has been submitted to the House?

The SPEAKER. That has been submitted to the House and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], who is entitled to twenty minutes, has yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. That is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Georgia will yield for a moment——

Mr. BARTLETT. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. I have a request pending for unanimous consent.

Mr. DALZELL. I think I can help the gentleman out, perhaps. I think the gentleman from Georgia has in mind the matter of controlling the time on general debate. That is what is in the mind of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to make a statement for about a minute.

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia, as he made the minority report on the bill, that he ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, and that he may control one-half of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That will come after we get through with the rule.

Mr. DALZELL. And the gentleman who made the report for the majority may control the other half.

Mr. BARTLETT. I could not hear what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said.

Mr. DALZELL. As I understand, the object of the gentleman from Georgia is not to discuss this rule, but to settle the question as to debate, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the time for debate may be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia, who made the minority report, and the other half by the gentleman who made the majority report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that he is asking to control debate in a matter that the House has not determined to take up. He is putting the cart before the horse.

Mr. DALZELL. I thought, from what the gentleman from Georgia said, that we could settle both matters at once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is out of order. The previous question has been ordered and the rule has not yet been adopted. After the rule has been adopted and the House has decided to consider the subject-matter, then unanimous consent will be asked, and, I have no doubt, granted, to do what the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires.

The SPEAKER. All this conversation is proceeding in the time of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to say that if I have the floor now——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has had it for four minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was not aware of it. The gentleman from Mississippi was claiming it. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss the rule, nor shall I do so. I am opposed to the rule and I am opposed to the bill, and because of the importance of the question I do not desire to have the time which ought to be devoted to general debate taken up with the discussion of the rule, and I shall content myself with voting against the rule and calling for a division.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to dispense with further debate on the rule and that that time be added to general debate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were—ayes 109, noes 22.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, and that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] control one half and that I control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for an equal division of the time from the present until 4 o'clock and that the same may be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Georgia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the rule provide for a discussion of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, or in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The rule provides for consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole. General debate is to continue until 4 o'clock, and after that the bill is to be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the original bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, the country has been too often reminded of the disasters which flow from the invasion of yellow fever into the United States, and the consensus of expert opinion seems to be that yellow fever never exists within the borders of the United States except by its importation from without. It is therefore a matter peculiarly for national prerogative to protect the citizens of the Republic from the dire calamities which result from that dread disease.

The citizens of the Gulf and South Atlantic Coast States, which have been particularly affected by yellow fever, have endeavored through State quarantine regulations to protect themselves and without satisfactorily doing so. They have accordingly endeavored from time to time to secure such national cooperation as would give effectual protection, and last year, in a convention held at Chattanooga, they resolved, I believe with unanimity, that they request the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled to enact a law whereby coast maritime and national frontier quarantine shall be placed exclusively under the control and jurisdiction of the United States Government, and that matters of interstate quarantine shall be placed under the control and jurisdiction of the United States Government, acting in cooperation with the several State boards of health. It seemed to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that only the first part of that resolution required legislation at this time, to wit, so much of it as authorized the National Government to establish effective quarantine against the importation of yellow fever. Accordingly the substitute reported by the committee for the bill H. R. 14336 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to establish so many quarantine stations as in his judgment are necessary to protect the United States against the invasion of yellow fever. That refers to ordinary quarantine stations, and it also authorizes him in his discretion, if further necessary, to establish a large and more comprehensive station at the Dry Tortugas, or at such, not exceeding three, additional places as he may deem necessary, whereto vessels may be sent that have on board anybody affected with the fever.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WANGER. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill is, of course, intended to be a permanent measure for the protection of the people of the United States against yellow fever. I have wondered why it is expressly limited in its terms to protection against yellow fever, why it does not include other contagious and infectious diseases. Is there any special reason why?

Mr. TAWNEY. The act of 1888 and the act of 1893 cover that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill, I understand, then goes beyond the act of 1893, and provides for extraordinary protection against yellow fever. Why is it not as important to apply the provisions of this bill to cholera and other contagious and infectious diseases as well as to yellow fever?

Mr. WANGER. Yellow fever seems to be the only one of these dread diseases which continually recurs and periodically threatens the health and welfare of the country, and the committee was averse to lodging in anybody the wholesale general authority to establish quarantine stations. It was quite willing, and it seemed to be necessary, that the Secretary of the Treasury, having been recognized heretofore as the proper officer with respect to that subject, might have the power as to this phase of the problem, and should establish all such stations as were necessary to give effective protection from this disease.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will say to the gentleman that I have the supposition there was some satisfactory reason why this bill was confined to the one disease, and I am glad to have had his explanation of the reasons.

Mr. WANGER. It is a limitation upon his jurisdiction in establishing quarantine stations.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. WANGER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman is speaking of the Dry Tortugas station. When was the quarantine station at that point abolished?

Mr. WANGER. In 1900—that is, the legislation was enacted in 1900.

Mr. TAWNEY. What was the reason for it?

Mr. WANGER. The reason for it was that it was represented by Admiral Bradford on behalf of the Navy Department that it was highly important to have a coaling station at that place. The Navy Department now does not deem it essential to continue that coaling station and consents to its abolition. Our committee, however, was not convinced of the need of a quarantine station at the Dry Tortugas, and therefore left its establishment at that place to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, the importance of having the Secretary armed with this discretion seems to be shown from the experience of the past. The States have established quarantine stations along the Gulf and on the South Atlantic seaboard, but the quarantine has not proven effective, and when we consider that it is not a question of how effectively this port or that port may be quarantined, but that to be effective the quarantine must cover all ports, and remember, further, that in the establishments of State and municipal quarantines the element of commercial enterprise enters, and as against a drastic quarantine established at one port some other port may conceive an opportunity to get important trade by having less severe regulations, thereby leading to confusion in the matter of regulations, it seems to be of the highest importance that there should be national control in order to secure uniform regulations as to the entire quarantine against yellow fever, effective along the entire border line at every point where the infection or cause of infection may be introduced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss the measure further at this time, and will yield one-half of the time which was originally at my disposal to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who introduced the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania leaves one-half of his original time to the disposal of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much time does that give me—an hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had an hour and forty-seven minutes when he took the floor. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to fifty-three minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as the author of the bill, I had hoped to have a disposal of at least an hour's time for the general debate, there being two hours of time on this side, and I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is in control of the time on this side, to grant me at least an hour for me to dispose of to those in favor of the bill on this side. That will leave an hour still for him and other members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. WANGER. No; it does not leave an hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With what you have consumed, it does.

Mr. WANGER. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. Then I am very glad to have the time I have. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY].

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the measure now under consideration is the most important to the people of the South of any measure pending before this Congress. It not only should be enacted into law, but the enactment should come speedily, for the summer is almost upon us, and if we are to have the benefits of the great protective power of this Government in keeping yellow fever from our shores during this year that power should be exercised without delay. The bill now before the House contains several features, each one of value, but in my opinion its principal and best feature is that one which places within the control of the Federal Government the quarantines at all the ports where there is danger of the introduction of yellow fever. The present law, enacted in 1893, leaves the control of port quarantines largely in the discretion of the States. Any State may, at its pleasure, surrender its port quarantines to the Federal Government, and when thus surrendered the Federal Government is authorized to take charge of them. This bill makes it mandatory upon the Federal Government to establish a quarantine station at every port where there is danger of the introduction of yellow fever. Provision is made to purchase the State quarantine stations, if any State desires to sell its stations to the Federal Government, but the duty is made mandatory upon the Federal Government to either purchase quarantine stations from the States, and take charge of them, or to establish quarantine stations of its own.

The bill also authorizes the establishment of places of refuge, not exceeding four in number, at such points off the coast as may be selected, to which infected vessels turned back from the ports may be sent for the purpose of disinfection and treatment of their sick or diseased passengers and crews.

The bill also carries an appropriation of $500,000 to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the bill, as well as for the purpose generally of preventing the importation of yellow fever into the United States, and for the further purposes, in cooperation with State or municipal health authorities, of eradicating it, should it be imported, of preventing its spread from one State into another State, and of destroying its cause.

The bill also undertakes the regulation of interstate quarantines to the extent only of providing for the transportation of freight and passengers through a State, where the regulations, restrictions, and safeguards of the Secretary of the Treasury are complied with, and where such freight or passengers have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the resolutions of the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service.

The rights of the States, however, even in this regulation, are provided for in a very marked degree, for it is further prescribed that neither passengers nor freight shall be debarked or landed in any locality contrary to its lawful regulations. The provision as to interstate quarantine is only to allow trains and vessels and other instrumentalities of commerce, under proper restrictions, to pass through a State.

The presentation of this bill has raised the question of the constitutional power of Congress to enact it. We are confronted again with those two old schools of conflicting constitutional thought. We have the one school contending that, as to all matters of interstate and foreign commerce, including quarantine and health regulations that affect them, the jurisdiction of Congress is exclusive. Upon the other hand we have the school of constructionists contending that in all matters of health regulations, even though involving a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, the jurisdiction of the State is exclusive. It is with some diffidence that I undertake at all the discussion of a constitutional question, and I do so in this instance with the utmost deference to the views of such gentlemen as may disagree with me. I do not subscribe, however, to either one of the contentions to which I have just referred, for I don't believe, under the Constitution and the construction given it by the Supreme Court, that in the matter now under consideration the jurisdiction of either the Congress or the States is necessarily exclusive. It seems to me that there is frequently more or less misunderstanding and confusion as to what is meant by the police power of a State.

POLICE POWER.

Police power, as I understand it, is equivalent to and the same as sovereign power—that is, the power of a sovereign. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in the License cases, in 5 Howard, 583, said:

> But what are the police powers of a State? They are nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty to the extent of its dominions. And whether a State passes a quarantine law, or a law to punish offenses, or to establish courts of justice, or requiring certain instruments to be recorded, or to regulate commerce within its own limits, in every case it exercises the same powers; that is to say, the power of sovereignty, the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion.

Unquestionably, in the beginning each State was a sovereign unto itself, not only as affecting its own people, but as affecting all other people. With the formation of the Union, however, the States yielded some of their sovereignty and transferred it to the General Government. As to the subjects over which the State has transferred sovereignty to the United States Government, the State no longer has over them sovereign or police power. As to the subjects over which the power of the State has not been transferred, the State is still sovereign and can exercise its police power. The State is sovereign to-day and has exclusive power over all matters that are strictly internal and that do not affect the commerce or the people of other States or of other countries. It is also sovereign as to all things that are not legitimate commerce. The power of the State that has not been yielded to the United States Government in the matter of health laws is clearly stated by Mr. Justice Harlan in the Compulsory Vaccination case, from Massachusetts, reported in 197 United States Reports. On page 24 he said:

> The authority of the State to enact this statute is to be referred to what is commonly called the "police power"—a power which the State did not surrender when becoming a member of the Union under the Constitution. Although the court has refrained from any attempt to define the limits of that power, yet it has distinctly recognized the authority of a State to enact quarantine laws and "health laws of every description;" indeed, all laws that relate to matters completely within its territory and which do not by their necessary operation affect the people of other States.

He further said, on page 25:

> A local enactment or regulation, even if based on the acknowledged police powers of a State, must always yield in case of a conflict with the exercise by the General Government of any power it possesses under the Constitution, or with any right which that instrument gives or secures.

Inasmuch as health regulations necessarily affect commerce, the following from Mr. Justice MacLean, on page 400 of 7th Howard Reports, in the Passenger cases, is also pertinent, to wit:

> All commercial action within the limits of a State and which does not extend to another State or foreign country is exclusively under State regulation.

The language of Mr. Justice White in a quarantine case, reported in 186 United States Reports, also illustrates what it is that the State has exclusive power over. In discussing the power of the States in the matter of quarantines, he said that the States have (p. 391) "the power to absolutely prohibit, additionally, where the thing prohibited is not commerce and hence not embraced in either interstate or foreign commerce."

This bill does not undertake by a line or a word in it to expressly repeal a single health law in any State of the Union, nor will it have the effect of repealing any single State law, except such as may come squarely in conflict with its provisions or the regulations made under it. No regulations can be made under it except in reference to commerce. As to things that are not commerce the States will remain as supreme after the passage of this bill as they were before. The Supreme Court has said time and again that where a valid law of any State, whether enacted under its police or any other power, comes into conflict with a law enacted within the constitutional power of Congress, the law of Congress must prevail, and for the reason that the Constitution in its sixth article says:

> This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

INSPECTION LAWS.

The framers of our Constitution were not unmindful of the necessity for quarantine laws in the preservation of health, and if gentlemen will turn to the Constitution they will find that by the very letter of that instrument the power of the State and the power of the Congress, at least so far as port quarantines are concerned, are both clearly defined. In the first clause of section 10 of Article I of the Constitution it is declared that no State shall do certain things with or without the consent of Congress, to wit:

> No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

In the second clause of this section it is provided, however, that with the consent of Congress the States may do certain things, to wit:

> No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any State on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

What are inspection laws? In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat.) Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said (p. 202):

> That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce will not be denied, but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived can not be admitted. The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country. * * * They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc., are component parts of this mass.

If the great Chief Justice was correct in saying that quarantine laws and health laws of every description are embraced within the term "inspection laws" as used in the Constitution, and I have never seen any dissent from the correctness of his interpretation, then I am justified in declining to accept the theory of exclusive control over port quarantines, whether claimed by the State or by the Congress. When gentlemen contend for the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress over port quarantines affecting foreign commerce, we point them to the Constitution, which expressly confers jurisdiction upon the State, and when gentlemen contend for the exclusive control of the State over all matters of health, even though affecting foreign commerce, we point them to the Constitution, wherein it is expressly provided that all the laws of their State in this regard are subject to the revision and control of Congress.

COMMERCE CLAUSE OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The inspection clause of the Constitution is not the only provision of that instrument that directly affects the subject of quarantines, for it is provided in the Constitution, in Article I, section 8, that the Congress shall have power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." All writers upon the Constitution and all the courts that have ever dealt with the subject have agreed that the primary cause of the creation of the Constitution was the desire to make commerce free and that the purpose of the clause just quoted was to take away from the States the power to interfere with or to impede or obstruct the free movement of commerce. The great purpose of the Constitution was to keep the markets of each State ever open to the products of all the other States, and so it was that in the very first article of the Constitution we find the commerce clause quoted.

In the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden and from that decision down to the present day the Supreme Court of the United States with perfect unanimity has held that the commercial power of the Congress is exclusive and that the States have no part therein. In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 195), Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said:

> This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the Constitution. * * * If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall also said (p. 209):

> In argument, however, it has been contended that if a law passed by a State, in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty, comes into conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, they affect the subject and each other, like equal opposing powers. But the framers of our Constitution foresaw this state of things, and provided for it by declaring the supremacy, not only of itself, but of the laws made in pursuance of it.

If it be true, then, that the jurisdiction and power of the Congress is exclusive over interstate and foreign commerce, it necessarily follows that whenever a State in the enactment of health laws, quarantine laws, or any other kind of laws, undertakes to regulate, control, or affect interstate or foreign commerce, or to interfere with its free movement, it invades the exclusive domain of the Congress. It requires no argument to demonstrate this proposition. But gentlemen say that this invasion has been made and that States have enacted quarantine laws that affect interstate and foreign commerce. Let us see how this has been done. In 1799 the Congress passed a law whereby it practically and in effect adopted the various State quarantine laws as its own, and called upon the officers of the United States Government to aid in their enforcement. It is pertinent here to suggest that if the States had been sovereign in this matter their quarantine laws would have rested upon such sovereignty and would not have required any consent from Congress or any sustaining act by Congress in order to make them valid. In discussing these very laws in Gibbons v. Ogden, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, on page 204, said:

> But they do not imply an acknowledgment that a State may rightfully regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the States, for they do not imply that such laws are an exercise of that power.

He said further:

> But in making these provisions the opinion is unequivocally manifested that Congress may control the State laws, so far as it may be necessary to control them, for the regulation of commerce.

In this same case, Mr. Justice Johnson, in his concurring opinion, said (p. 234):

> It was obvious that inspection laws must combine municipal with commercial regulations; and while the power over the subject is yielded to the States, for obvious reasons, an absolute control is given over State legislation on the subject, so far as that legislation may be exercised, so as to affect the commerce of the country.

On the same page, in speaking of section 10 of Article I of the Constitution, he also said:

> The first clause of it specifies those powers which the States are precluded from exercising, even though the Congress were to permit them. The second, those which the States may exercise with the consent of Congress. And here the sedulous attention to the subject of State exclusion from commercial power is strongly marked. Not satisfied with the express grant to the United States of the power over commerce, this clause negatives the exercise of that power to the States as to the only two objects which would ever tempt them to assume the exercise of that power, to wit, the collection of a revenue from imposts and duties on imports and exports; or from a tonnage duty. As to imposts on imports or exports, such a revenue might have been aimed at directly by express legislation, or indirectly in the form of inspection laws; and it became necessary to guard against both. Hence, first, the consent of Congress to such imposts or duties is made necessary, and as to inspection laws, it is limited to the minimum of expenses. Then the money so raised shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, or may be sued for, since it is declared to be for their use. And, lastly, all such laws may be modified or repealed by an act of Congress. It is impossible for a right to be more guarded.

The States have exercised quarantine powers and have thereby affected interstate and foreign commerce not alone by reason of the act of 1799 just referred to, but they have done so under the construction given by the Supreme Court to the commerce clause of the Constitution. The Supreme Court has said that, in the absence of legislation by Congress, the States may to a certain extent pass laws affecting interstate and foreign commerce. What the court has said can best be stated in the language of the court itself, as found in the Kentucky Bridge case, reported in 154 United States, page 269, as follows:

> The adjudications of this court with respect to the power of the States over the general subject of commerce are divisible into three classes. First, those in which the power of the State is exclusive; second, those in which the States may act in the absence of legislation by Congress; third, those in which the action of Congress is exclusive and the States can not interfere at all. The first class, including all those wherein the States have plenary power and Congress has no right to interfere, concern the strictly internal commerce of the States. * * * Within the second class of cases—those of what may be termed concurrent jurisdiction—are embraced laws for the regulation of pilots (12 Howard, 299; 2 Wall., 450; 13 Wall., 236; 102 U. S., 572), quarantine and inspection laws, and the policing of harbors (9 Wheaton, 1-203; 11 Peters, 102; 107 U. S., 381), etc.

The statement made in this opinion that quarantine laws come within that class of laws affecting commerce which the States may enact, in the absence of legislation by Congress, has been the rule always adhered to by the Supreme Court. There has never been any departure from it. In the Passenger cases, reported in 7 Howard, and in the very opinion of Mr. Justice Wayne, relied upon by those who deny the constitutional power of Congress to pass this bill, appears the following language, reported on page 424:

> How much of it [police and sovereign power] have the States retained?
> I answer unhesitatingly, all necessary to their internal government. Generally, all not delegated by them in the Articles of Confederation to the United States of America; all not yielded by them under the Constitution of the United States. Among them qualified rights to protect their inhabitants by quarantine from disease; imperfect and qualified, because the commercial power which Congress has is necessarily connected with quarantine; and Congress may, by adoption, presently and for the future provide for the observance of such State laws, making such alterations as the interests and conveniences of commerce and navigation may require, always keeping in mind that the great object of quarantine shall be secured.

In the case of Gilman v. Philadelphia, reported in 3 Wallace, Mr. Justice Swayne, on page 730, is quoted by those opposing this measure, as follows:

> Under quarantine laws, a vessel registered or enrolled and licensed may be stopped before entering her port of destination or be afterwards removed and detained elsewhere for an indefinite period; and a sale of goods upon which the duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under "health laws," and if it can not be purged of its poison may be committed to the flames.
> The inconsistency between the powers of the States and the nation as thus exhibited is quite as great as in the case before us, but it does not necessarily involve collision or any other evil. None has hitherto been found to ensue. The public good is the end and aim of both.
> If it be objected that the conclusion we have reached will arm the States with authority potent for evil and liable to be abused, there are several answers worthy of consideration. The possible abuse of any power is no proof that it does not exist. Many abuses may arise in the legislation of the States which are wholly beyond the reach of the Government of the nation. The safeguard and remedy are to be found in the virtue and intelligence of the people. They can make and unmake constitutions and laws, and from that tribunal there is no appeal. If a State exercise unwisely the power here in question, the evil consequences will fall chiefly upon her own citizens. They have more at stake than the citizens of any other State. Hence there is as little danger of the abuse of this power as of any other reserved to the States. Whenever it shall be exercised openly or covertly for a purpose in conflict with the Constitution or laws of the United States it will be within the power, and it will be the duty, of this court to interpose with a vigor adequate to the correction of the evil.

It is interesting to consider in connection with this quotation that the court, in this opinion, was not dealing with quarantine laws at all. The question before the court was as to the power of the State of Pennsylvania to authorize the erection of a bridge over a navigable river. The court held that the act of the State was not in violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution, because the erection of bridges over navigable rivers was not such a matter as required a uniform rule, and, in the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject, the States could establish such bridges under their own regulations and to that extent affect commerce. In discussing the question that was before the court and preceding the language quoted the court referred to the power of the States to maintain pilot-age systems, to regulate the sale of imported liquor, and in the same connection to impose quarantine laws, and then used the language quoted. The significant part of the opinion, however, follows the quoted language and fully sustains the contention I am making that all such laws of the State—bridge laws, pilotage laws, quarantine laws, etc.—are only valid in the absence of legislation on the same subject by Congress. On page 731 the court said:

Lastly, Congress may interpose, whenever it shall be deemed necessary, by general or special laws. It may regulate all bridges over navigable waters, remove offending bridges, and punish those who shall thereafter erect them. Within the sphere of their authority, both the legislative and judicial power of the nation are supreme. A different doctrine finds no warrant in the Constitution and is abnormal and revolutionary.

The License cases, reported in 5 Howard, are also relied upon by those who attack the constitutionality of the pending bill, and yet Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in these cases (p. 578), said:

The controlling and supreme power over commerce with foreign nations and the several States is undoubtedly conferred upon Congress. Yet, in my judgment, the State may nevertheless, for the safety and convenience of trade, or for the protection of the health of its citizens, make regulations of commerce for its own ports and harbors and for its own territory, and such regulations are valid, unless they come in conflict with a law of Congress.

The License cases, of course, were not dealing with a quarantine law, and the references made to quarantines—those quoted by gentlemen on the other side and by me—were made as matter of argument, and yet the very reference just quoted shows the opinion of the court that no quarantine law passed by a State and affecting interstate or foreign commerce will be valid where it comes into conflict with a similar or any law passed by Congress acting within its power.

Story on the Constitution (4th ed., 2d vol., secs. 1074 and 1075) sustains the rule laid down by the Supreme Court. He said, in discussing the commercial power of Congress and the extent to which it can be constitutionally applied:

It is not doubted that it extends to the regulation of navigation and to the coasting trade and fisheries within as well as without any State, wherever it is connected with the commerce or intercourse with any other State, or with foreign nations. It extends to the regulation and government of seamen on board of American ships, and to conferring privileges upon ships built and owned in the United States in domestic as well as foreign trade. It extends to quarantine laws and pilotage laws and wrecks of the sea, etc.

Much stress is also laid by those who oppose this measure on the case of New York v. Miln, in 11 Peters, 133. In this case the court upheld the first section only of a certain law of the State of New York in reference to immigration. The first section exacted a requirement of every master of a vessel landing passengers to furnish the mayor, on oath, with a correct description of the names, occupations, place of residence, place where going, etc., of his passengers. It was held by the Supreme Court that this requirement came within the police power of the State. The further requirements of this act were held invalid in 7 Howard, 283. The difficulty in relying upon New York v. Miln as an authority grows out of the fact that this decision was practically and substantially overruled in 92 United States, 259. The New York law, reviewed in New York v. Miln, was amended to meet the decision in 7 Howard, and, as amended, still included the first section that was upheld in New York v. Miln. The entire law came on to be reviewed by the Supreme Court, in 92 United States, in the case of Henderson v. New York, and the court held the entire law to be beyond the power of the State. Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion and reviewing the case of New York v. Miln, said (p. 266):

From this decision Mr. Justice Story dissented, and in his opinion stated that Chief Justice Marshall, who had died between the first and the second argument of the case, fully concurred with him in the view that the statute of New York was void, because it was a regulation of commerce forbidden to the States.

He also said (p. 267):

As the law now stands, the master or owner of every vessel landing passengers from a foreign port is bound to make a report similar to the one recited in the statute held to be valid in the case of New York v. Miln.

He said further (p. 271):

We are of opinion that this whole subject has been confided to Congress by the Constitution; that Congress can more appropriately and with more acceptance exercise it than any other body known to our law, State or national; that by providing a system of laws in these matters, applicable to all ports and to all vessels, a serious question, which has long been matter of contest and complaint, may be effectually and satisfactorily settled. Whether in the absence of such action the States can, or how far they can, by appropriate legislation protect themselves against actual paupers, vagrants, criminals, and diseased persons arriving in their territory from foreign countries we do not decide.

Since this opinion was handed down the Congress has taken charge of the admission of immigrants into this country and has prescribed who may come in and who may not. "Persons afflicted with a loathsome or with a dangerous contagious disease" can't come in at all. (Acts 1903.)

DECISIONS DIRECTLY ON QUARANTINE.

It was in accordance with the fundamental principles of the Constitution, as they have been defined and construed by the Supreme Court in the cases I have quoted and in many others that could be quoted, that when this court came to pass directly upon the validity of State quarantine laws they upheld such laws upon the sole and only ground that Congress had not legislated upon the subject. In doing so the court announced no new or revolutionary doctrine. The opinions in these cases are in strict accord with repeated rulings previously made.

In the case of Morgan v. Louisiana, reported in 118 United States Reports, the court said (p. 465):

Quarantine laws belong to that class of State legislation which, whether passed with intent to regulate commerce or not must be admitted to have that effect, and which are valid until displaced or contravened by some legislation of Congress.

The court also said (p. 463):

But it may be conceded that whenever Congress shall undertake to provide for the commercial cities of the United States a general system of quarantine or shall confide the execution of the details of such a system to a national board of health or to local boards, as may be found expedient, all State laws on the subject will be abrogated, at least so far as the two are inconsistent. But until this is done the laws of the State on the subject are valid.

In another quarantine case, reported in 186 United States, Mr. Justice White said (p. 387):

That from an early day the power of the States to enact and enforce quarantine laws for the safety and the protection of the health of their inhabitants has been recognized by Congress is beyond question. Yet until Congress has exercised its power on the subject such State quarantine laws and State laws for the purpose of preventing, eradicating, or controlling the spread of contagious or infectious diseases are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, although their operation affects interstate or foreign commerce, is not an open question.

On page 391 he also said:

In other words, the power exists until Congress has acted to locally regulate by health and quarantine laws, even although interstate and foreign commerce is affected and the power to absolutely prohibit additionally obtains where the thing prohibited is not commerce, and hence not embraced in either interstate or foreign commerce.

There was a dissenting opinion in this case upon the ground that the quarantine law of the State of Louisiana under consideration went beyond the power of the State in prohibiting the landing of well people in an infected locality, but in this dissenting opinion it is said (p. 397):

The power of the several States, in the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject, to establish quarantine regulations, to prohibit the introduction into the State of persons infected with disease or recently exposed to contagion, and to impose a reasonable charge upon vessels subjected to examination at quarantine stations is so well settled by repeated decisions of this court as to be no longer open to doubt.

Another very interesting quarantine case is reported in 176 United States, page 1. This is the case of Louisiana v. Texas, and is a case that illustrates in a striking degree the necessity for the very legislation that is being proposed. It may also possibly illustrate to some extent the cause of some of the opposition to the pending measure. In this case it appears that the State of Louisiana, by her governor, filed an original bill with the Supreme Court against the State of Texas, her governor and health officer claiming original jurisdiction for the Supreme Court in the matter. The bill alleged that the quarantine laws of the State of Texas were unjust, unreasonable, and unnecessary, and that they were enacted and enforced not for the purpose of protecting the health of the people of Texas, but for the purpose of laying an embargo upon the port of New Orleans in the interest of the port of Galveston and other Texas cities. The bill alleged that as the result of these laws the cotton receipts of New Orleans had been diminished and that its commerce had very materially suffered, while the commerce of Galveston and other Texas cities had grown. The bill prayed for an injunction against the enforcement of the Texas quarantine laws. The Supreme Court declined to take jurisdiction, holding that the matters stated did not present a controversy between two States. The court thought that the real parties at interest were certain citizens of the respective States and that the States as States were not involved. The court also decided that the State of Louisiana, having no jurisdiction or power over interstate commerce, could not go into court and ask for its protection. The court, however, in rendering its opinion, and speaking through Mr. Justice Fuller, said (p. 21):

It is not charged that this statute is invalid, nor could it be if tested by its terms. While it is true that the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the States is a power complete in itself, acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution, and that where the action of the States in the exercise of their reserved powers comes into collision with it the latter must give way, yet it is also true that quarantine laws belong to that class of State legislation which is valid until displaced by Congress, and that such legislation has been expressly recognized by the laws of the United States almost from the beginning of the Government.

The court further said on page 22:

Although, from the nature and subjects of the power of regulating commerce, it must be ordinarily exercised by the National Government exclusively, this has not been held to be so where in relation to the particular subject-matter different rules might be suitable in different localities. At the same time Congress could by affirmative action disapprove the local laws, substitute laws of its own, and thus correct any unjustifiable and oppressive exercise of power by State legislation.

Gentlemen tell us that the language of the court in these three quarantine cases is all mere dicta. The authority for such an assertion is not revealed. These cases deal directly with quarantines. Their determination involved a determination of the power of Congress and the power of the State in matters of quarantine, and the conclusions reached by the court in each of these cases determined these relative powers and necessarily had to determine them in order to pass upon the allegations made in each case that the State quarantine laws were in violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution.

If any question has been clearly and definitely settled by the Supreme Court, it appears to be the quarantine question. This great court has said as plainly and unequivocally as language can state a proposition that the State may, in the absence of legislation by Congress, and only in such absence, make quarantine regulations that affect interstate and foreign commerce. They have also stated that whenever Congress establishes its own quarantine regulations for interstate and foreign commerce, the regulations of the State in conflict therewith shall be void.

Perhaps the most striking and far reaching of all the opinions of the Supreme Court on this subject is found in the case of Reid v. Colorado, reported in 187 United States, 137. The court was dealing with a cattle quarantine and inspection law of the State of Colorado and was considering among other questions the question as to whether or not the State law was in conflict with the act of Congress of May 29, 1884, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals. The court said (page 147):

Congress has not by any statute covered the whole subject of the transportation of live stock among the several States, and except in certain particulars not involving the present issue has left a wide field for the exercise by the States of their power by appropriate regulations to protect their domestic animals against contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

The court also said on page 146:

It is quite true, as urged on behalf of the defendant, that the transportation of live stock from State to State is a branch of interstate commerce, and that any specified rule or regulation in respect to such transportation which Congress may lawfully prescribe or authorize, and which may properly be deemed a regulation of such commerce, is paramount throughout the Union. So that when the entire subject of the transportation of live stock from one State to another is taken under direct national supervision and a system devised by which diseased stock may be excluded from interstate commerce, all local or State regulations in respect of such matters and covering the same ground will cease to have any force, whether formally abrogated or not; and such rules and regulations as Congress may lawfully prescribe or authorize will alone control. * * * The power which the States might thus exercise may in this way be suspended until national control is abandoned and the subject be thereby left under the police powers of the States.

Also:

The State—Congress not having assumed charge of the matter, as involved in interstate commerce—may protect its people and their property against such dangers, taking care always that the means employed to that end do not go beyond the necessities of the case or unreasonably burden the exercise of privileges secured by the Constitution of the United States.

It would be equally true, under this opinion, if Congress undertook complete supervision of interstate commerce and devised a system for excluding diseased or infected commerce, that all State laws on the subject would be abrogated. Congress, under this opinion, has far greater power than the pending bill seeks to exercise.

LEGISLATIVE PRECEDENT.

I think I have demonstrated that the pending measure marks no departure from judicial precedent. Indeed, it does not go to the length that judicial precedent authorizes. I purpose to show further that it marks no departure from legislative precedent. If gentlemen will turn to the act of 1893, approved February 15 of that year, the same being an act granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service and Bureau of Public Health, it will be found that in section 6 of this act, when the United States Government takes charge of port quarantines, very broad powers are given to its quarantine officers, as will appear by the following language:

And after treatment of any infected vessel at a national quarantine station and after certificate shall have been given by the United States quarantine officer at said station that the vessel, cargo, and passengers are each and all free from infectious diseases or danger of conveying the same, said vessel shall be admitted to enter into any port of the United States named in the certificate.

The pending measure only supplements the act of 1893 by making it mandatory upon the Federal Government to take charge of port quarantines. The duty of the Federal Government, as well as its power and authority, when it does take charge of them, are now set forth at length in the act of 1903.

Another broad and far-reaching law was enacted February 2, 1903, in reference to cattle, and enacted directly in pursuance of the opinion of the Supreme Court in Reid v. Colorado. This is an act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to more effectually suppress and prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes, and among other things provides that the Secretary of Agriculture—

Is hereby authorized and directed from time to time to establish such rules and regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live stock from any place within the United States where he may have reason to believe such diseases may exist into and through any State or Territory, including the Indian Territory, and into and through the District of Columbia and to foreign countries, as he may deem necessary, and all such rules and regulations shall have the force of law. Whenever any inspector or assistant inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry shall issue a certificate showing that such officer had inspected any cattle or other live stock which were about to be shipped, driven, or transported from such locality to another, as above stated, and had found them free from Texas or splenetic fever infection, pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, or any other infectious, contagious, or communicable disease, such animals so inspected and certified may be shipped, driven, or transported from such place into and through any State or Territory, including the Indian Territory, and into and through the District of Columbia.

It is interesting to recall, as many of us here do, that when this act of 1903 was passed no serious question as to the invasion of States rights was raised or insisted upon. While there was some little discussion of that question, the bill passed the House with practical unanimity and without even the formality of a roll call or a division. Surely it will not be contended that there is any greater duty resting upon the United States Government or any greater power vested in it to protect the lives of dumb beasts than to protect the lives of human beings. Nor can it be argued that the interstate commerce in cattle, or in other animals, is of any greater importance, or of as much importance, as the interstate commerce in the other great articles of commerce of this country. If the act of 1903 was justifiable, and everybody seemed to think it was justifiable at the time it was enacted, and no bill has, as yet, been offered to repeal it, the pending measure is certainly authorized.

The act of 1893, which I have just referred to, and which authorizes a certificate of a United States quarantine inspector to admit a vessel into any port of the United States named within the certificate, is a more specific and direct invasion of what gentlemen are pleased to term "States rights" than anything in the pending measure, and yet, upon examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I find that at the time it finally passed the House in its present form it provoked so little opposition that the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Kilgore, who opposed it, was never able to muster at any time more than two or three votes in the dilatory motions he made to delay its passage.

The present Congress is not bound to follow a precedent established by a previous Congress in matters of legislation; but when gentlemen speak of the pending measure as being revolutionary and unheard of, we point them to these acts of previous Congresses, adopted with practical unanimity, and show them that these acts claim a much broader power for Congress as against the power of the States than does the pending measure.

POLICY OF THE MEASURE.

The pending measure being fully sustained and authorized by judicial and legislative precedents, presents, in my judgment, the question of policy only for our consideration. I maintain that the United States Government, as a matter of broad national policy, should assume charge of the port quarantines, and for the simple reason that such quarantines deal with the people of foreign countries, with whom the States, as States, can have no relations. The only government we have that can deal with a foreign country is the United States Government, and, therefore, it should regulate all our intercourse with foreign people.

In the case of Brown v. Maryland, reported in 12 Wheaton, 419, the Supreme Court held a law of the State of Maryland exacting a license of foreign importers unconstitutional. The court held that the foreigner, having paid the duties exacted by the United States Government, was entitled to enter his goods in the United States and to sell them in the original package without paying a license therefor to the State.

Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said (p. 446):

What would be the language of a foreign government which should be informed that its merchants, after importing, according to law, were forbidden to sell the merchandise imported? What answer would the United States give to the complaints and just reproaches to which such an extraordinary circumstance would expose them? * * * Such a state of things would break up commerce.

The same reasoning would apply in the case of a quarantine imposed by a State, where it was contended by the State on the one hand that the article proposed to be imported was infected, and was contended by the foreign government upon the other hand that such article was not infected. What answer would the United States Government make to a foreign government in such a case? Will it be insisted that the United States Government, with its exclusive power over foreign commerce has no power to regulate its admission into this country? In the case of Chy Lung v. Freeman (92 U. S., p. 275) the Supreme Court held unconstitutional a statute of California creating a State commissioner of immigration and giving him practically unlimited and arbitrary power to say what foreigners could come into the State and upon what condition they could come. The court said (p. 280):

> The passage of laws which concern the admission of citizens and subjects of foreign nations to our shores belongs to Congress, and not to the States. It has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The responsibility for the character of those regulations and for the manner of their execution belongs solely to the National Government. If it be otherwise, a single State can at her pleasure embroil us in disastrous quarrels with other nations.

The Federal Government, however, should take charge of port quarantines upon the further ground that the protection to be afforded by such quarantines is national and not local. If yellow fever is permitted to enter one of our ports, its invariable tendency is to spread from the port into the State and from the State into another State and from State to State, and where it does not actually spread from State to State, the alarm and apprehension that its appearance arouses invariably result most disastrously to the commerce of the country. It is therefore of great importance to keep yellow fever out of this country, not for the protection of any particular port, but for the protection of all the people in all the States and for the protection of the commerce of the country. Yellow fever is almost as disastrous to human life and far more destructive to commerce than would be a foreign army invading our shores. The United States Government stands guard with its Navy and Army to keep out the foreign army for the protection of all the people. It should also stand guard at each of our ports to keep out yellow fever, for yellow fever, too, is a foreign enemy. It is not a native of this country, and it never exists in this country except when imported from foreign shores.

The United States Government should take charge of our port quarantines also, because in no other way can we have that uniform system of protection that really protects and really inspires the confidence necessary to allay apprehension and protect commerce in time of alarm.

In my own city, the port of Brunswick, Ga., the United States Government has charge of our quarantine station, because we long ago surrendered it to the Government. We have all the protection that this great Government can give us in keeping yellow fever from entering our port through a foreign vessel. We are constantly menaced, however, by the ports of other States, where the United States Government has not taken charge of their quarantine stations. Where a State maintains its own quarantine system, it frequently and usually happens that the quarantine stations at the ports are controlled by the municipal governments at the ports. Quaranine regulations are prescribed by city governments. We thus have the power that is charged with the responsibility of upbuilding commerce at the port, also charged with the responsibility of enforcing health regulations. In such cases it will frequently happen, and has happened in the past, that the matter of health will be subordinated to the matter of commerce. In other words, that the city in order to prevent an injury to its commerce by the loss of trade, will take chances in the matter of health and will from time to time relax its health rules in order to avoid losing business.

If the result of such laxness was only to endanger the particular municipality guilty of the laxness, there could, perhaps, be no complaint on this score, but inasmuch as that laxness, if it results in the introduction of yellow fever, will not only affect that particular city, but will affect the people in the interior and will affect other States, the matter is one of very grave concern as well as of national concern. In my judgment, the commercial power and the health power should be absolutely divorced. The authority charged with the duty of keeping out disease should have no interest in the promotion of commerce. I do not know of any way by which such divorce can be had except by imposing upon the United States Government the duty and the responsibility of keeping yellow fever out of this country. To my mind it is a wholly unauthorized and untenable position to say that the Congress, which has the exclusive power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, has not the power to so regulate it as to keep it free from yellow fever. I believe that Congress not only has the power to regulate it so as to keep yellow fever out of this country, but that it is the duty of Congress to do so. I believe that the Congress would be derelict in its chiefest and highest duty and would violate the fundamental principles upon which the Constitution is founded if, in the exercise of its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, it did not so regulate such commerce as to secure not only its freedom from disease, but also in such manner as to protect the people and the States against the introduction of disease through any instrumentality of that commerce.

INTERSTATE QUARANTINE.

Section 7 of the pending bill has provoked more criticism than any other part of the bill. That section reads as follows:

> That every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service; and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to delay or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

The authorities I have already quoted show that the jurisdiction and power of the Congress is just as absolute in interstate commerce as it is in foreign commerce. If the exclusive power of Congress over interstate commerce be conceded, there can be no question as to our authority to incorporate section 7 in the pending bill.

Those of us who live in the South and who recall our experiences last year, and in many other years, in the matter of State quarantines, can appreciate the necessity for section 7 or for some similar provision. We have seen an entire train turned back at a State line and not permitted to cross the State, not because it was infected with disease, but because it was alleged to have come from an infected district. We have seen people sent hundreds of miles out of their way in order to reach their destination. We have seen them delayed indefinitely. We have seen shotgun quarantines. We have witnessed the almost complete disruption and breaking up of commerce, costing the South thereby millions of dollars. We have almost seen civil war threatened between two sovereign States. Those of us who have witnessed these things can appreciate the importance and desirability of devising some way or plan by which they will not occur again. The difficulties we have encountered have not been over the admission of disease into a State—nobody wants it admitted—but have been over the admission of commerce. It seems to me that gentlemen who insist upon the right of their State to say whether or not a train shall enter it, lose sight of the fact that the State out of which the train proposes to come has an equal right to say that its commerce shall move, and it must be remembered that the transportation of people is just as much commerce as the transportation of merchandise. We have thus presented the conflicting rights of two equal opposing powers. Who is to settle such conflict? Gentlemen who say that they are opposed to the centralization of power in the United States Government, and who argue that the States and the people at home can and should remedy the most of the evils about which they complain and not come to Congress for relief in every instance, have my full and entire sympathy in all the argument they have made or can make on this line, but I do not believe that such argument applies to the situation I am presenting. With two sovereign States contending with each other, the one saying that its commerce and its people are uninfected and constitute interstate commerce and have the right to proceed, and the other sovereign State saying that such commerce and people are infected and shall not come within its domain, and therefore shall not proceed, there is presented a controversy that is beyond the power of the people or the States to settle. Which State is to settle it? Which people are to decide it? I ask the question in vain, for everyone knows that neither State nor the people of either State have the right or the power to settle it. Indeed, such a controversy can not be settled in the courts, if the issue be raised by a State. If the State seeking to have its commerce move applies to the courts for relief, it will be told that the courts can give no relief. The State will be confronted with the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Louisiana v. Texas, in 176 United States, where, on page 19, the court said:

> Inasmuch as the vindication of the freedom of interstate commerce is not committed to the State of Louisiana, and that State is not engaged in such commerce, the cause of action must be regarded not as involving any infringement of the powers of the State of Louisiana, or any special injury to her property, but as asserting that the State is entitled to seek relief in this way, because the matters complained of affect her citizens at large.

No State can maintain a bill to protect the freedom of its interstate commerce, for no State has such proprietary interest in interstate commerce as will authorize it to file a bill for its protection. Such a controversy as we have suggested and as has existed time and again presents absolutely no question except the question of the regulation of interstate commerce, over which the Congress has exclusive jurisdiction. The place to go to get relief, and absolutely the only place, is the Congress. It was to avoid and prevent just such controversies over commerce that the Constitution was framed and the commerce clause placed in it. The matter is peculiarly and exclusively within the control of Congress and Congress should act in the matter.

Gentlemen who express themselves as being afraid of vesting this power in Congress and as being afraid that the officials of the United States might, in the exercise of their power, introduce yellow fever into a State, forget that we are not proposing by this measure to vest any power whatsoever in Congress. The Constitution has already vested it, and we are simply seeking its exercise. The framers of the Constitution thrashed out the question of the possible abuse of power by Congress and decided that the possibility of such abuse was no argument against the grant of the power or against its exercise. Congress possesses many powers that it might abuse to the hurt of the States. It might abuse its power to declare war, to coin money, to impose duties, and in many other ways; but the fact that these powers might be abused has never been held or deemed an argument against their existence. Section 7 of the proposed bill, instead of being aimed at the reserved powers of the States, or against the integrity or sovereignty of the States, is aimed directly in support of the power of each and every State to send its goods and its people, constituting its legitimate commerce, into all the other States. Its purpose is to foster, encourage, and protect the people and the commerce of each one of the States. A state has no extraterritorial power. Therefore it can not purge and safeguard its own commerce and demand its passage through another State. Congress alone has the power to do this, and it is this power that is now invoked. This bill is not to introduce yellow fever into a State, but to purge commerce of it, so that commerce can proceed.

The framers of our Constitution foresaw with unerring wisdom that the only way by which the commerce of the several States could be protected was by vesting all power over commerce between the States in the Congress. To-day we seek to invoke the exercise of the power that these wise men granted to the Congress, and we invoke it as the one power that can protect all the people and all the commerce of all of the States. It must be borne in mind that the power of Congress, while absolute over interstate commerce, does not extend beyond such commerce. Congress has no power to compel a State to allow persons or goods to remain within its domain. Congress may provide for the admission of people and goods into a State, where they form a part of interstate commerce, but the moment the interstate journey is completed and the goods are delivered to the consignee, or the passengers landed at their destination, both goods and passengers cease to be interstate commerce, and the State may expel them in the exercise of its police power.

In the Passenger cases (7 Howard) Mr. Justice MacLean said (p. 405):

If the transportation of passengers be a branch of commerce, of which there can be no doubt, it follows that the act of New York in imposing the tax is a regulation of commerce.

Also:

Passengers, when they leave the ship and mingle with the citizens of the State, become subject to its laws.

As illustrating further the power of Congress over interstate commerce, and the want of such power in the States, the Supreme Court, in 163 United States, page 154, said:

The State may make reasonable regulations to secure the safety of passengers, even on interstate trains, while within its borders, but the State can do nothing which will directly burden or impede the interstate traffic of the company, or impair the usefulness of its facilities for such traffic.

The Supreme Court also said, in this connection, in 118 United States Reports, page 572:

It can not be too strongly insisted upon that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it. * * * And it would be a very feeble and useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if, at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country, the State within whose limits a part of the transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with or seriously embarrassing this commerce.

Care has been taken in framing the pending bill to see to it that Congress exercises the power it possesses over interstate commerce to as limited an extent as is possible to let commerce move. Section 7 distinctly provides that the health certificate of the Bureau of Public Health shall not be sufficient to let a passenger debark or goods be landed in any State over the objection of the State. This section provides simply that the certificate of the Bureau of Public Health shall permit a train or a vessel to pass through a State. Unless we are going to deny Congress all power over interstate commerce, what greater recognition of the reserved power of the States could be asked than is acknowledged in this section?

IN CONCLUSION.

I feel very earnestly the necessity for the passage of this bill or some similar bill. I am not committed to the particular wording of this bill or of any other bill. I am only desirous that the health of my people shall be protected, in so far as it is within the power of the Congress to give protection, and that the commerce of my section of the country shall be permitted to move and flow at all times in usual and natural channels. I have been willing to accept the bill without section 7 in it, not because I have questioned or now question the power of Congress to enact it or the wisdom of enacting it, but because in the interest of port quarantine and the appropriation contained in the bill I have been willing to make such concessions as would insure the passage of legislation securing these things. My judgment is that the Committee on Commerce has improved the bill by adding this section to it, and for my own part I shall be glad to see it remain in the bill. In supporting the bill, with or without section 7, I do not feel that I am doing any violence to the Constitution. I believe that I am acting strictly within the letter of the Constitution. I believe in States rights. I stand for their observance and maintenance. I stand for all the reserved powers of the States, but while I do this I also stand for the observance and maintenance of all the powers delegated to the United States Government. I not only stand for the observance and maintenance of the delegated powers of the United States Government, but I am ready to invoke the exercise of these powers whenever, in my judgment, they can be exercised to the benefit of my people.
